

Strasbourg, 8 December 2006

Study no. 316/ 2004

Restricted
CDL(2006)086
Engl. only

EUROPEAN COMMISSION FOR DEMOCRACY THROUGH LAW
(VENICE COMMISSION)

DRAFT STUDY

ON THE EFFECTIVENESS OF NATIONAL REMEDIES IN RESPECT OF
EXCESSIVE LENGTH OF PROCEEDINGS

On the basis of comments by

Mr Bogdan AURESCU (Substitute member, Romania)

Mr Pieter van DIJK (Member, the Netherlands)

Mr Giorgio MALINVERNI (Member, Switzerland)

Ms Elsa GARCIA MALTRAS DE BLAS (Expert, Spain)

Mr Franz MATSCHER (Expert, Austria)

TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. Introduction.....	3
II. The scope and aims of the present study	4
III. The right to an effective remedy before a national authority in respect of the unreasonable duration of proceedings : the international guarantee.....	5
A. The right to a hearing within a reasonable time: what is at stake	5
B. The reasonableness requirement in Article 6 of the Convention : an outline.....	7
C. The right to an effective remedy before a national authority under Article 13: an outline	8
D. The relationship between Article 6 § 1 and Article 13 of the Convention.....	10
IV. The supervision by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe in respect of the implementation of length-of-proceedings cases.....	12
V. Existing domestic remedies in respect of allegedly lengthy proceedings in the Council of Europe member States: a comparative survey.....	14
A. In general.....	14
B. State of Art.....	17
1. Remedies available for civil/administrative proceedings	17
2. Remedies available for criminal proceedings.....	19
VI. The assessment of the existing national remedies by the European Court of Human Rights.....	21
A. In general.....	21
B. Remedies available for civil/administrative proceedings	22
C. Remedies available for criminal proceedings.....	27
VII. The requirements of Article 13 of the Convention in respect of unreasonably lengthy proceedings according to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights	29
A. As regards the kind of remedy	30
B. As regards the legal basis for the remedy and its clarity/accessibility	32
C. As regards the general characteristics of the remedial procedure	33
VIII. The Venice Commission's proposals concerning the effectiveness of domestic remedies in respect of excessive length of proceedings.....	35
A. As concerns the kind of remedy.....	35
B. As concerns whether or not the compensatory remedies for the excessive length of proceedings should be specific	38
C. As concerns the form of the remedies	38
1. Civil and administrative proceedings.....	38
2. Criminal proceedings	42
IX. MAIN CONCLUSIONS	45
TABLE 1	47
TABLE 2	50

I. Introduction

1. In December 2002, in its opinion on the implementation of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights¹ (hereinafter “the Court” or “the Strasbourg Court”), the Venice Commission expressed the view that it would be useful if the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe would develop guidelines on what measures are to be taken by the respondent States following the finding by the Court of a breach of a particular provision of the European Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter “the European Convention” or “the Convention”), so that member States may know in advance what consequences they may face. These guidelines, which should be inspired by both the practice of the Committee of Ministers and a more explicit case-law of the Court in this respect would, in the Commission’s opinion, allow for a stricter approach by the Committee of Ministers to the supervision of the execution of the Court’s judgments.

2. Following a request by the Romanian authorities during the Conference on “The European Convention on Human Rights: from integrating standards to shaping solutions” (Bucharest, 8-9 July 2004), the Venice Commission decided to carry out a comparative study on existing national remedies with respect to allegations of excessive length of proceedings, with a view to proposing possible improvements in their availability and effectiveness.

3. The Secretariat subsequently prepared a questionnaire on the kind, nature and characteristics of national remedies which currently exist in Council of Europe member States (CDL(2004)124). Replies to this questionnaire in respect of 44 European countries (CDL(2005)92) were provided by Venice Commission members or were obtained through the valuable assistance of the Registry of the European Court of Human Rights, as well as of the Department of Execution of judgments of the European Court of Human Rights and of the Secretariat of the Committee of Experts for the improvement of procedures of the protection of human rights (DH-PR), Directorate General II of the Council of Europe.

4. The Venice Commission also worked in close co-operation with the European Commission for the Efficiency of Justice (CEPEJ), a body established on 18 September 2002 by Resolution Res(2002)12 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe², with the aims “(a) to improve the efficiency and the functioning of the justice system of member states, with a view to ensuring that everyone within their jurisdiction can enforce their legal rights effectively, thereby generating increased confidence of the citizens in the justice system and (b) to enable a better implementation of the international legal instruments of the Council of Europe concerning efficiency and fairness of justice”.

5. A conference, co-organised by the Venice Commission and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Romania within the framework of the Romanian Chairmanship of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe, was held in Bucharest on 3 April 2006 on “Remedies for unduly lengthy proceedings: a new approach to the obligations of Council of Europe member states”. On this occasion, representatives of the Venice Commission, the Strasbourg Court, the Directorate General II of the Council of Europe, CEPEJ, Government Agents and representatives of the Romanian authorities discussed about possible guiding principles in the identification of effective remedies for unreasonably lengthy proceedings. The results of these discussions are fed into this study.

¹ Opinion on the implementation of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights, CDL-AD(2002)34, § 102.

² www.coe.int/cepej.

6. The present study is based on contributions by Messrs. Bogdan Aurescu (substitute member, Romania); Pieter Van Dijk (member, the Netherlands); Elsa Garcia Maltras de Blas (expert, Spain); Franz Matscher (expert, Austria) and Giorgio Malinverni (member, Switzerland). It was drafted by the Constitutional Co-operation Division of the Secretariat, and discussed and adopted by the Venice Commission at its ... Plenary Session (Venice, ... 2006).

II. The scope and aims of the present study

7. It is important at the outset to clarify what is the scope of the present study. The length of the proceedings is a very complex problem which many European States experience with different degrees of gravity: for some of them it is a generalised problem, a “systemic” one”, whereas for others it must rather be seen as an occasional dysfunction of an otherwise effective system of administration of justice.

8. The identification of the causes of excessive delays is a complex exercise. It is certainly not the ambition of the Venice Commission to proceed with such identification. Other bodies are better equipped and more specialised, in primis the European Commission for the Efficiency of Justice (CEPEJ), whose tasks are, amongst others, to analyse the results of the judicial systems, to identify the difficulties they meet and to define concrete ways to improve, on the one hand, the evaluation of their results, and, on the other hand, the functioning of these systems.

9. Indeed, CEPEJ has looked into the causes for the excessive duration of proceedings³ and has identified them through the analysis of the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights⁴. CEPEJ has also prepared a “Compendium of “best practices” on time-management of judicial proceedings”⁵. The Venice Commission refers to the CEPEJ analyses, and reiterates to be neither equipped nor tasked with these analyses. Issues relating to the functioning of justice and the concrete management of court procedures are outside of the scope of competence of the Venice Commission.

10. The Venice Commission stresses however that members States of the Council of Europe have obligations in respect of the length of proceedings stemming not only from Article 6 § 1 but also from Article 13 of the European Convention on Human Rights. As the European Court of Human Rights put it, “by becoming a High Contracting Party to the European Convention on Human Rights the respondent State assumed the obligation to secure to everyone within its jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in Section 1 of the Convention. In fact, the States have a general obligation to solve the problems that have led to the Court finding a violation of the Convention. This should therefore be the primary goal of the respondent State. Should violations of the Convention rights still occur, the respondent States must provide mechanisms within their respective legal systems for the effective redress of violations of the Convention rights”.⁶

³ See the following documents: Length of court proceedings in the member States of the Council of Europe based on the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, CEPEJ(2006)15 Prov; Length of court proceedings in the member States of the Council of Europe based on the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights - Executive Summary, CEPEJ(2006)15 Prov; Reducing judicial times in the countries of Northern Europe, CEPEJ(2006)14.

⁴ CEPEJ(2006)15 Prov, pp. 26-43.

⁵ CEPEJ(2006)-TF-DEL (2006)5 Rev (bis).

⁶ ECtHR, Lukenda v. Slovenia judgment of 6 October 2005, §§ 94 and 95.

11. The obligations under Article 13 of the Convention, i.e. the provision of effective remedies in respect of breaches of the reasonable time requirement, are not the direct object of the work of CEPEJ. They are dealt with by the Committee of Ministers with the assistance of the Department of the Execution of judgments of the Directorate General II of the Council of Europe.

12. The Commission intends to deal with the obligations of Council of Europe member States to provide effective remedies against the excessive length of proceedings within the meaning of Article 13 of the Convention. Inevitably, acceleratory remedies will concern the management and functioning of national courts: in this respect, the Venice Commission will of course again refer to the work of CEPEJ.

13. The present study aims at assisting the Committee of Ministers and the Directorate General II, as well as the Council of Europe member States, in addressing this problem in a global manner, with a view to identifying solutions based on the national experiences, the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights and the know-how of the Council of Europe.

14. The Commission expresses the hope that its study may also assist the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, which has endeavoured to contribute to the speedy and effective implementation of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights. In particular, the Assembly's Committee of Legal Affairs and Human Rights is currently examining cases relating to five countries in which, due to major structural problems, unacceptable delays of implementation have arisen.⁷

III. The right to an effective remedy before a national authority in respect of the unreasonable duration of proceedings : the international guarantee

A. The right to a hearing within a reasonable time: what is at stake

15. Article 6 § 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights provides as follows:

"In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law."

16. In requiring cases to be heard within a "reasonable time", the Convention underlines the importance of administering justice without delays which might jeopardise its effectiveness and credibility.⁸ Excessive delays in the administration of justice constitute an important danger, in particular for the respect of the rule of law.⁹

17. The Convention requires proceedings to be conducted "within a reasonable time". The notion of reasonableness must reflect the necessary balance between expeditious proceedings and fair proceedings.¹⁰ A careful balance needs to be struck between procedural safeguards, ⁷ See PACE, Implementation of judgments of the European Court of Human Rights, Report of the Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights, 18 September 2006, Doc. 11020.

⁸ ECtHR, Katte Klitsche de la Grange v. Italy judgment of 27 October 1994, § 61.

⁹ Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe, Res DH(97)336, Length of civil proceedings in Italy: supplementary measures of a general character, 27 May 1997.

¹⁰ ECtHR, Nideröst-Huber v. Switzerland judgment of 18 February 1997, § 30; mutatis mutandis, Acquaviva v. France judgment of 21 November 1995, Series A no. 333-A, p. 17, § 66.

which necessarily entail the existence of lengths that cannot be reduced, and a concern for prompt justice.¹¹

18. Celerity of proceedings responds to the need for legal certainty, for both citizens and the State, and to the need to further, and restore as soon as possible, the peaceful coexistence of individuals (Rechtsfrieden). Indeed, the economic life too suffers from contested situations which remain unsettled for too long. Long-lasting disputes disturb such peaceful coexistence: judicial proceedings may not be pursued ad infinitum, not even when this prolongation may eventually lead to substantive justice. Decisions must at some foreseeable point become final.

19. The duration of judicial proceedings certainly affects the interests of at least one of the parties to such proceedings: indeed, overstepping the reasonable time requirement of Article 6 of the Convention may result in (procedural) breaches of other important Convention provisions, such as Article 3 (in the case of unreasonably slow investigations into allegations of ill-treatment, for example¹²), Article 5 (in the case of lack of a speedy decision by a court on a habeas corpus action, or Article 8 (in the case of undue delays in custody proceedings which may result in the de facto determination of the issue submitted to the court before it has held its hearing¹³).

20. Justice delayed is justice denied. The undue postponement of judicial decisions may result in a denial of justice for the parties to the proceedings (although it may happen that parties delay the proceedings on purpose). In more general terms and in the longer run, it risks to affect the confidence which the general public places in the capacity of the State to dispense justice, to decide disputes, and, very importantly, to punish crimes as well as to prevent and deter future crimes. This may cause or even incite the recourse by individuals to alternative means of dispute settlement or dispensation of punishment. The deleterious effects on the rule of law of such a situation are evident.

21. The public interest in the proper functioning and use of justice, including in its cost-effective management, is another important element.

22. Celerity, however, must not be sought to the detriment of the good administration of justice¹⁴. Due consideration must always be given in the first place to the need to ensure the fairness of the proceedings: the other guarantees implied in Article 6 of the Convention, notably the right of access to a court, the equality of arms, the adversarial principle, and the right to dispose of adequate time and facilities for the preparation of one's defence, must not be undermined or affected by a rushed conduct of the procedure.

23. The quality of the legal reasoning and the extent to which judgments are motivated and made transparent to the parties and to the public, are also extremely important and need to be given due consideration. As CEPEJ pointed out, "meticulously drafting a decision, weighing up the reasons for it, and making it clear and comprehensible are all operations that take time", which may prompt a decision to "lighten the requirements for providing reasons for a decision". However, "a decision with clearly stated reasons allows the parties to accept it more easily. Good decisions at first instance have the effect of reducing appeals".¹⁵ The Strasbourg Court has stated in this respect that: "since the remittal of cases for re-examination is usually ordered ¹¹ CEPEJ(2004)19rev2, A new objective for Judicial Systems: the processing of each case within an optimum and foreseeable timeframe, available at www.coe.int/cepej, p. 7.

¹² ECtHR, Labita v. Italy judgment of 6 April 2000, §§ 133, 136.

¹³ ECtHR, W. v. United Kingdom judgment of 8 July 1987, § 65.

¹⁴ ECtHR, Gast and Popp judgment of 25 February 2005, § 75.

¹⁵ CEPEJ (2004)19rev2, pp. 8, 9.

as a result of errors committed by lower courts, the repetition of such orders within one set of proceedings may disclose a serious deficiency in the judicial system”¹⁶

24. The requirement of celerity must not impinge on the need to preserve the independence of the judiciary in organising its own procedures without undue internal and external control.

25. In conclusion, each case must be processed within an optimum time-frame. The CEPEJ places great importance on the foreseeability of such time-frame. It notes in fact that “one of the most awkward problems for court users is that they are unable to predict when proceedings will end. (...) Users need foreseeable proceedings (from the outset) as much as an optimum time. However, it must be noted that a foreseeable time-limit is not per se an acceptable time-limit”.¹⁷

26. The assessment of the reasonableness of the duration of any set of proceedings must never be mechanical. It necessarily depends on the specific circumstances of the case and must reflect the concern of ensuring the right balance amongst all the different guarantees set out by Article 6 of the Convention.¹⁸

B. The reasonableness requirement in Article 6 of the Convention : an outline

27. The requirement that proceedings must be conducted within a reasonable time applies to the determination of both criminal charges and civil rights and obligations.¹⁹ Article 6 applies to criminal and civil, but also to certain disciplinary²⁰ and administrative proceedings, which are qualified as “civil” or as “criminal” by the case-law of the ECtHR.²¹

28. As regards the period to be taken into consideration, in civil cases it normally starts when the case is brought before the competent judicial authority, or even before, if a preliminary claim before an administrative authority is necessary.²² In criminal cases, it starts when the person is “accused”, that is when he or she is informed of criminal proceedings having been instituted against him or her²³ or suffers important repercussions on account of such proceedings.²⁴

¹⁶ ECtHR, Silc v. Slovenia judgment of 29 June 2006, § 32; Wierciszewska v. Poland judgment of 25 November 2003, § 46.

¹⁷ CEPEJ (2004)19rev2.

¹⁸ See F. Tulkens, « Le droit d’être jugé dans un délai raisonnable : les maux et le remède », CDL(2006)34, p. 4.

¹⁹ Numerous issues have arisen before the Court as regards the scope of Article 6. They are far too complex to be addressed in this study, for which they are of no direct relevance.

²⁰ ECtHR, Engel and others v. the Netherlands judgment of 8 June 1976, § 83; Öztürk v. Germany judgment of 21 February 1984, § 56.

²¹ With the notable exception, inter alia, of the disputes “which are raised by public servants whose duties typify the specific activities of the public service in so far as the latter is acting as the depository of public authority responsible for protecting the general interests of the State or other public authorities”: ECtHR, Pellegrin v. France judgment of 8 December 1999, § 66. For procedures concerning the admission and expulsion of aliens, see ECtHR, Maaouia, judgment of 5 October 2000, and for taxation cases, see ECtHR, Ferrazzini, judgment of 12 July 2001.

²² ECtHR, Jorg Nina Jorg and others v. Portugal judgment of 19 February 2004, § 30.

²³ ECtHR, Deweert v. Belgium judgment of 27 February 1980, Series A no. 35, p. 24, § 46; Wemhoff v. Germany judgment of 27 June 1968, Series A no 7, p. 26, § 19; Ringeisen v. Austria judgment of 16 July 1971, Series A no 13, p. 45, § 100;

²⁴ ECtHR, Foti and others v. Italy judgment of 10 December 1982, Series A no 56, p. 18, § 52; Lavents v. Latvia judgment of 28 November 2002, § 85.

29. The final point is normally the date when the judgment becomes final (it is either filed with the court's registry or notified, or the deadline for appealing it has expired etc., depending on the applicable domestic rules).²⁵

30. In the assessment of the reasonableness of the length of a set of proceedings, regard must be had to the circumstances of the case and the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the applicant's conduct and that of the competent authorities, and the importance of what was at stake for the applicant (the parties) in the dispute.²⁶

31. Special diligence is required on the part of the competent authorities, for instance, in cases when parties to the proceedings are affected by illnesses, or in labour disputes, child-care cases²⁷ and claims of compensation for health damage allegedly resulting from medical malpractice²⁸. It is also generally required in criminal cases, in particular when the accused is detained on remand.²⁹

32. Article 6 § 1 of the Convention imposes on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts can meet the requirements of this provision³⁰. Accordingly, the Court does not accept backlogs or administrative difficulties as justification for procedural delays.³¹ However, exceptional political or social situations in the country concerned may be taken into consideration for a transitory period.³²

33. The obligation to organise its judicial system in a manner that complies with the requirements of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention also applies to a Constitutional Court. However, "when so applied it cannot be construed in the same way as for an ordinary court. Its role as guardian of the Constitution makes it particularly necessary for a Constitutional Court sometimes to take into account other considerations than the mere chronological order in which cases are entered on the list, such as the nature of a case and its importance in political and social terms. Furthermore, while Article 6 requires that judicial proceedings be expeditious, it also lays emphasis on the more general principle of the proper administration of justice"³³.

C. The right to an effective remedy before a national authority under Article 13: an outline

34. Ubi jus ibi remedium. When there is a right, there should be a remedy. Pursuant to Article 13 of the Convention:

²⁵ ECtHR, Barattelli v. Italy judgment of 4 July 2002, § 15; Mattoccia v. Italy judgment of 25 July 2000, § 75.

²⁶ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment of 29 March 2006 [GC], § 177.

²⁷ See, amongst others, ECtHR, H. v. UK, Series A no. 120-B, § 83; Olsson no. 2 v. Sweden, Series A no. 250, § 103; Hokkanen v. Finland, Series A no. 299-A, § 72; Ruotolo v. Italy Series A no. 230-D, § 17.

²⁸ ECtHR, Marchenko v. Russia judgment of 5 October 2006, § 40.

²⁹ ECtHR, Debboub v. France judgment of 9 November 1999, § 46.

³⁰ ECtHR, Bottazzi v. Italy judgment of 28 July 1999, § 22.

³¹ ECtHR, Kolb and others v. Austria judgment of 17 April 2003, § 54.

³² ECtHR, Milasi v. Italy judgment of 25 June 1987, §§ 17-20; ECtHR Maltzan and Others v. Germany decision of 2 March 2005 (GC).

³³ ECtHR, Gast and Popp v. Germany judgment, cit. § 75.

“Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated should have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by a person acting in an official capacity”.

35. The effectiveness of human rights largely depends on the effectiveness of the remedies which are provided to redress their violation. The right to a remedy in respect of an arguable claim of a violation of a fundamental right or freedom is expressly guaranteed by almost all international human rights instruments.³⁴

36. The international guarantee of a remedy implies that a State has the primary duty to protect human rights and freedoms first within its own legal system. Article 1 of the Convention requires the Contracting States to “secure” the rights and freedoms under the Convention. The European Court exerts its supervisory role subject to the principle of subsidiarity,³⁵ i.e. only after domestic remedies have been exhausted or when domestic remedies are unavailable or ineffective. The right to an effective remedy established in Article 13 of the Convention stems directly from this principle.

37. Although the principle of the rule of law, which is contained in the Preamble and in Article 3 of the Statute of the Council of Europe, of which it constitutes one of the three pillars (together with democracy and respect for human rights), would justify the right of an effective remedy as an autonomous one, Article 13 does not contain a general guarantee of effective legal protection; it exclusively refers to those cases in which the alleged violation concerns one of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Convention. It cannot be invoked independently but only in conjunction with one or more articles of the Convention or of one of its Protocols. Naturally, the scope of the obligation under Article 13 will vary depending on the nature of the applicant’s complaint under the Convention.³⁶

38. Notwithstanding the literal wording of Article 13, the existence of an actual breach of another (“substantive”) provision of the Convention is not a prerequisite for its application.³⁷ According to the case-law of the Court, Article 13 requires that, when a claim of a violation under the Convention is an “arguable” one, a remedy allowing both to have such claim decided and subsequently to obtain appropriate relief, must be available.³⁸ The arguability test requires that a claim “only needs to raise a Convention issue which merits further examination.”³⁹

³⁴ See for example, in addition to Article 13, Article 8 of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights and Freedoms, Article 2.3 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Article 6 of the Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, and Article 6 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women.

³⁵ ECtHR, Z. and Others v. UK judgment of 10 May 2001, § 103.

³⁶ See for example, Chahal v. UK, cit., §§ 151-152.

³⁷ See Klass and Others v. Federal Republic of Germany, judgment of 6 September 1978, § 64.

³⁸ See among others, Klass and Others, cit., § 64; Kaya v. Turkey, judgment of 19 February 1998, pp. 329-30, § 106. However, Article 13 cannot be interpreted so as to require a remedy in domestic law in respect of any supposed grievance under the Convention that an individual may have, no matter how unmeritorious his complaint may be (Boyle and Rice v. UK, judgment of 27 April 1988, § 52; Powell and Rayner v. UK, judgment of 21 February 1990, §§ 31-33).

³⁹ See European Commission of Human Rights before the Court in Boyle and Rice v. United Kingdom, § 53. Non-arguable is not the same as manifestly ill-founded in the sense of Article 35(3) of the Convention. However, although originally the Court seemed to leave open the possibility that a complaint that is declared manifestly ill-founded may still be deemed to have been arguable (Boyle and Rice v. UK, § 53), it conceded that “it is difficult to conceive how a claim that is “manifestly ill-founded” can nevertheless be “arguable” and vice versa” (ibidem, § 54). And in Powell and Rayner the Court held in so many words that the “dual [i.e. domestic and European] system of enforcement is at risk of being undermined if Article 13 (...) is interpreted as requiring national law to make available an ‘effective remedy’ for a grievance classified under Article 27 §2 [the present Article 35 § 3] (...) as being so weak as not to warrant examination on its merits at international level” (ECtHR, Powell and Rayner v UK, § 33). It is now standing case-law that if a complaint under a substantive right is declared manifestly ill-founded, the arguability of that

39. The “national authority” competent for providing the remedy must not necessarily be a judicial authority.⁴⁰ On the other hand, the powers and procedural guarantees of an authority will be relevant when determining whether a particular remedy is effective.⁴¹ Any such remedy must be effective in practice as well as in law.⁴²

40. The effectiveness of a national remedy within the meaning of Article 13 does not depend on the certainty of a favourable outcome.⁴³ Effectiveness is to be assessed in respect of the possibility of redressing the alleged violation of the right guaranteed by the Convention, possibly by cumulating available remedies. Indeed, even when none of the remedies available to an individual would satisfy the requirements of Article 13 taken alone, the aggregate of remedies provided for under domestic law may be considered as “effective” in terms of this article.⁴⁴ In other terms, there is no particular form of remedy required, the Contracting States being afforded a margin of discretion in conforming to their obligations under this provision.⁴⁵

41. To be considered effective and thus conform to Article 13, a domestic remedy must allow the competent national authority both to deal with the substance of the relevant Convention complaint and to grant “appropriate relief”.⁴⁶ This can entail, for example, the ending, modification, non-application or annulment of the challenged action, or obtaining reparation of damages resulting from the violation. The principle of effectiveness also implies that the procedure of obtainning domestic remedies must not be unjustifiably hindered by acts or omissions of the authorities of the State concerned.⁴⁷

D. The relationship between Article 6 § 1 and Article 13 of the Convention

42. Until fairly recently, the Convention organs considered that, since the requirements of Article 6.1 are stricter than those of Article 13, in case a violation of Article 6 §1 was found, it was unnecessary to determine whether there had also been a breach of Article 13; the same complaint under Article 13 is denied on the basis of the same reasoning (e.g. ECtHR, Igor Vrabec v. Slovakia judgment of 5 October 2004). At the admissibility stage, if a complaint about access to court or the reasonable time requirement under Article 6(1) is declared admissible, the Court will adopt the same position with respect to any claim under Article 13 without a separate examination (ECtHR, Jonasson v. Sweden judgment of 30 March 2004). At the phase of the merits, the Court will usually find concurrent breaches of the reasonable time requirement under Article 6(1) and the requirement of an effective remedy under Article 13 (ECtHR, Rachevi v. Bulgaria judgment of 23 September 2004, §§ 60-68 and §§ 96-104). In some cases, however, the Court finds reason to thoroughly examine the existence of an effective remedy after it has found a breach of the reasonable time requirement. And, indeed, in certain cases the Court treated the complaint concerning Article 6(1) as being absorbed into the examination of the more general obligation under Article 13 (ECtHR, Kaya v. Turkey judgment of 19 February 1998, § 105).

⁴⁰ See for example, Golder v. UK, judgment of 21 February 1975, § 33, Laender v. Sweden, judgment of 26 March 1987.

⁴¹ Thus for example, the possibility of applying to the judge responsible for the execution of sentences cannot be regarded as an effective remedy for the purposes of Article 13, as he is required to reconsider the merits of his own decision, taken moreover without any adversarial proceedings (see Domenichini v. Italy, judgment of 15 November 1996, § 42) In the same sense, see also: Calogero v. Italy, judgment of 15 November 1996, § 41.

⁴² See among others, Ilhan v. Turkey judgment of 27 June 2000, §§ 61-62.

⁴³ See for example, Vilvarajah v. UK, judgment of 30 October 1991, § 122.

⁴⁴ See among many others, Silver and Others v. UK, judgment of 25 March 1983, § 113 and Chahal v. UK, judgment of 15 November 1996, §145.

⁴⁵ See Chahal v. UK, cit.

⁴⁶ See for example, Smith and Grady v. UK judgment of 27 September 1999, § 135; Aksoy v. Turkey, judgment of 18 December 1996, § 95.

⁴⁷ ECtHR, Altun v. Turkey judgment of 1 June 2004, § 70

requirements of the latter being entirely “absorbed” by those of the former.⁴⁸ This was the case when the claim concerned the absence, within the national legal system, of a body competent to examine the claim that the length of proceedings was excessive,⁴⁹ or of any means to shorten or terminate the excessive length of procedure.⁵⁰

43 Such reasoning was not without critics even within the Court itself. Judges Matscher and Pinheiro Farinha, in their separate opinion in Malone v. UK, while recognizing the “obscure” nature of Article 13, contested the adequacy of the arguments put forward by the Court to justify a non-examination of the allegation of a breach of this Article.⁵¹ They, however, noted that the “absorption argument” may be correct in so far as the procedural guarantees of Article 6 of the Convention are concerned. In fact, national law generally does provide for specific procedural remedies which are “stronger” than that of Article 13 in respect of procedural guarantees of Article 6, whereas to a wide extent this is not the case regarding the excessive length of proceedings. It is with respect to this specific part that Article 13 has its “raison d’être”.

44. The change in reasoning with regard to the right to an effective remedy in respect of the excessive length of proceedings came in 2000, with Kudla v. Poland.⁵²

45. In this judgment, the Court considered “in the light of the continuing accumulation of applications before it concerning the alleged violation of the right to a hearing within reasonable time” that “the time has come to review its case-law” according to which, in case of a violation of that right (Article 6 § 1), there would be no separate examination of an alleged breach of the right to an effective remedy (Article 13). In support of this review the Court noted the “important danger that exists for the rule of law within national legal orders when excessive delays in the administration of justice occur in respect of which litigants have no domestic remedy”, that it had already pointed out in its previous case-law related to this matter.⁵³

⁴⁸ See Airey v. Ireland, judgment of 9 October 1979, § 35. Another obstacle to the applicability of Article 13 to the issue of the excessive length of proceedings, put forward by the former European Commission on Human Rights, was its non application in cases where the alleged violation took place in the context of judicial proceedings (Report on Bartolomeo Pizzetti v. Italy, of 10 December 1991).

⁴⁹ See for example, Giuseppe Tripodi v. Italy, judgment of 25 January 2000, § 15.

⁵⁰ See for example, Bouilli v. France, judgment of 7 December 1999, § 27.

⁵¹ “... We recognise that Article 13 (art. 13) constitutes one of the most obscure clauses in the Convention and that its application raises extremely difficult and complicated problems of interpretation. This is probably the reason why, for approximately two decades, the Convention institutions avoided analysing this provision, for the most part advancing barely convincing reasons. It is only in the last few years that the Court, aware of its function of interpreting and ensuring the application of all the Articles of the Convention whenever called on to do so by the parties or the Commission, has also embarked upon the interpretation of Article 13). We refer in particular to the judgments in the cases of Klass and Others (Series A no. 28, paras. 61 et seq.), Sporrong and Lönnroth (Series A no. 52, para. 88), Silver and Others (Series A no. 61, paras. 109 et seq.) and, most recently, Campbell and Fell (Series A no. 80, paras. 124 et seq.), where the Court has laid the foundation for a coherent interpretation of this provision. Having regard to this welcome development, we cannot, to our regret, concur with the opinion of the majority of the Court who felt able to forego examining the allegation of a breach of Article 13. In so doing, the majority, without offering the slightest justification, has departed from the line taken inter alia in the Silver and Others judgment, which was concerned with legal issues very similar to those forming the object of the present case. Indeed, applying the approach followed in the Silver and Others judgment the Court ought, in the present case, and to the same extent, to have arrived at a finding of a violation of Article 13”, Malone v. UK, judgment of 2 August 1984, Series A no. 82.

⁵² ECtHR, Kudla v. Poland judgment of 26 October 2000. The Court’s change of position must have also been inspired by concerns of judicial economy, as a “radical effort” to find an antidote to its ever-increasing backlog. See J-F Flauss, Le droit à un recours effectif au secours de la règle du délai raisonnable: un revirement de jurisprudence historique, in : Revue trimestrielle des Droits de l’Homme, 2002, pp. 179-201. See also L. Burgogue-Larsen, De l’art de changer de cap, in : Libertés, justice, tolérance : mélanges en hommage au Doyen Gérard Cohen-Jonathan (Vol 1), Bruxelles, Bruylant, 2004, pp. 343-347 ; J. Andriansimbazovina, délai raisonnable du procès, recours effectif ou déni de justice ?, in : Revue française de droit administratif, 2003(I), pp. 85-98.

⁵³ Ibidem, § 148. See also Bottazzi v. Italy, judgment of 28 July 1999, ECHR 1999-V, § 22.

46. According to the Court, the requirements of Article 13 should be considered as “reinforcing” those of Article 6 §1, rather than being absorbed by the obligation to prohibit inordinate delays in legal proceedings under Article 6 §1.⁵⁴

47. The Court also underlined the subsidiary character of the machinery of complaint to the Court, recalling that by virtue of Article 1 of the Convention, “the primary responsibility for implementing and enforcing the guaranteed rights and freedoms is laid on the national authorities.”⁵⁵ This subsidiary character of the Strasbourg system of complaint is articulated precisely in Articles 13 and 35 § 1 of the Convention. Article 13 establishes an additional guarantee.⁵⁶ According to the travaux préparatoires, Article 13 aims at according a means whereby individuals may obtain relief at national level for violations of their Convention rights before having recourse – if they are of the opinion that no (satisfactory) relief has been given – to the Strasbourg Court.⁵⁷

IV. The supervision by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe in respect of the implementation of length-of-proceedings cases⁵⁸

48. In pursuance of Article 46 § 2 of the Convention, the task of supervising the execution of the judgments issued by the Court lies with the Committee of Ministers. It has a general duty to scrutinize all measures taken by the State concerned to abide by the final judgement of the Court.

49. Like the obligation of the States under Article 46(1) to abide by the judgments of the Court in any case to which they are parties, the power of supervision of the Committee of Ministers under Article 46(2) extends to measures pertaining to the individual case,⁵⁹ general measures⁶⁰ and the award of just satisfaction. The Committee of Ministers issues a final resolution when it deems to have discharged its functions under Article 46 § 2.

50. When supervising the implementation of judgments finding a breach of the reasonable time requirement, the Committee of Ministers most often requires, as an individual measure, the acceleration of the proceedings in question if these are still pending. Such speeding up, which may be seen as a form of restitutio in integrum, will often be the result of a judgment by the Strasbourg Court, even in the absence of a specific remedy under domestic law.

51. The Committee of Ministers insists on the fast-tracking of proceedings in particular in those cases in which the Strasbourg Court imposes a “special diligence” (see para. 31 above) or ⁵⁴ ECtHR, Kudla v. Poland, cit., § 152.

⁵⁵ Ibidem, § 152.

⁵⁶ ECtHR 28 July 1998, Selmouni v. France, § 74; ECtHR Kudla v. Poland judgment of 26 October 2000, § 152.

⁵⁷ Collected Editions of the Travaux Préparatoires, vol. II, pp. 485 and 490, and vol. III, p. 651.

⁵⁸ In this respect, see also the Venice Commission’s opinion on the implementation of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights (CDL-AD (2002) 34, §§ 28-33 and §§ 41-42.

⁵⁹ Such as measures necessary to ensure that the applicant is put, insofar as possible, in the same situation as he or she enjoyed prior to the violation of the Convention. These may entail, for instance, the need to put an end, if possible retroactively, to an unlawful situation.

⁶⁰ Such as legislative amendments, in order to prevent further violations of a similar nature. See Interim Resolutions DH (99) 436 and DH (99) 437 concerning excessive length of proceedings before the administrative courts and civil courts, respectively, in Italy, where the Committee of Ministers decided to resume its examination “of the question as to whether the announced measures will effectively prevent new violations of the Convention”.

when the breach concerns the failure to enforce a domestic court's decision or concerns the continuing breach of a substantive Convention provision (the right of property, for example).⁶¹

52. In case the proceedings complained about have ended in the meanwhile, in addition to possible damages the taking of general measures to prevent similar violations in the future with respect to the applicant and in other cases will be the main means of implementation of the Court's judgment.

53. When a State refuses to execute a judgment of the Court, the Committee of Ministers may decide to open a procedure of monitoring in respect of that State's commitments. It did so in 2000, when it set up a special annual monitoring procedure concerning the reform of justice aimed at solving the problem of the excessive length of proceedings in Italy.⁶² In its Interim Resolution, the Committee of Ministers underlined the importance of taking "general measures preventing new violations of the Convention similar to those already found".⁶³

54. In the late Nineties, the Committee of Ministers undertook a series of activities aimed at improving the compliance with commitments accepted by member States, in particular through better functioning of the judicial system.⁶⁴ In 2000, the Ministers' Deputies thus decided to start monitoring the effectiveness of national judicial remedies with respect to the length of proceedings (judicial control of deprivation of liberty and trial within reasonable time), and to the execution of judicial decisions.⁶⁵ In particular, in 2002 the Committee of Ministers set up the European Commission for the Efficiency of Justice (CEPEJ) with the aim to address the major problems of the judicial systems of member States and define ways to improve their efficiency and functioning.⁶⁶ In 2004, CEPEJ set out a Framework Programme entitled "A new objective for judicial systems: the processing of each case within an optimum and foreseeable timeframe",⁶⁷ which recommended lines of action aimed at realising this objective. The Task Force on timeframes of proceedings was charged with the task of translating these lines of action into concrete measures enabling them to improve procedure timeframes in the member States.⁶⁸

55. The ever-increasing number of applications to the European Court of Human Rights in connection with unreasonably long proceedings cast doubts as to the effectiveness of the existing national remedies. In May 2004, the Committee of Ministers adopted its ⁶¹ See M. Lobov, « L'exécution des arrêts relatifs à la durée excessive de procédures judiciaires : l'expérience du Comité des ministres », CDL(2006)035, p. 3.

⁶² Interim Resolution DH (2000) 135 on Excessive length of judicial proceedings in Italy. General measures. Adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 25 October 2000.

⁶³ Ibidem, §§ 2-3.

⁶⁴ See document on "Compliance with member States' commitments", CM/Monitor (2001)14 of 15 November 2001, Part I. General comments.

⁶⁵ Ibidem. In 2001, the Committee of Ministers instructed the Steering Committee for Human Rights (CDDH) to "examine ways and means of assisting member States with a view to a better implementation of the Convention in their domestic law and practice, including the provision on effective remedies".⁶⁵ The CDDH, in turn, entrusted the work of following up this decision to its Committee of Experts for the Improvement of Procedures for the Protection of Human Rights (DH-PR). See the Report of the 51st meeting of the CDDH (27 February – 2 March 2001), document CDDH (2001) 15, § 11. In September 2002, the Secretariat of the CDDH prepared a memorandum containing a comparative overview of national practice with respect to effective remedies and mechanisms for reparation in cases of violation of the Convention by national authorities. This document shows that in various member States, legislative activities or discussions on this matter were in progress (See document "Implementation of the European Convention on Human Rights – Effective remedies at national level", DH-PR (2002) 001rev, 10 September 2002).

⁶⁶ See para. 4 above.

⁶⁷ See CEPEJ (2004) 19 Rev.

⁶⁸ See «Terms of reference of the Working Group on evaluation of judicial systems (CEPEJ-GT-EVAL)», adopted by the CEPEJ-GT-2004.

Recommendation on the improvement of domestic remedies (hereinafter: “the Recommendation”).⁶⁹ The Recommendation recalled that, in addition to the obligation of ascertaining the existence of effective national remedies in the light of the case-law of the Court, member States have the general obligation to solve the problems underlying violations found (emphasis added). The member states are thus called to, in particular:

- “review, following Court judgments which point to structural or general deficiencies in national law or practice, the effectiveness of the existing domestic remedies and, where necessary, set up effective remedies, in order to avoid repetitive cases being brought before the Court; and
- pay particular attention /.../ to the existence of effective remedies in cases of an arguable complaint concerning the excessive length of judicial proceedings”.

56. Further to this Recommendation, the Steering Committee for Human Rights (CDDH)⁷⁰ decided to resume the study started in 2001, on means of assisting member States in the implementation of the Convention in domestic law and practice, with the aim of producing a report on the existing national practices in the field of effective remedies.⁷¹ The preparation of the report is in progress.⁷²

V. Existing domestic remedies in respect of allegedly lengthy proceedings in the Council of Europe member States: a comparative survey

A. In general

57. The right to a hearing within a reasonable time is today enshrined in the constitutions⁷³ and/or legislation⁷⁴ of almost all Council of Europe member States. It may also be provided for through the direct application of the European Convention on Human Rights in domestic legal systems.⁷⁵ However, even without specific provisions in domestic law, it is a general principle of ⁶⁹ CM Rec (2004)6, adopted on 12 May 2004, at the 144th session of the Committee of Ministers (12-13 May 2004).

⁷⁰ Through its Committee of Experts for the Improvement of Procedures for the Protection of Human Rights (DH-PR).

⁷¹ See document: «Improvement of domestic remedies. Follow-up to the implementation of the Recommendation Rec (2004)6 – Information received by the Secretariat», DH-PR (2004) 012, 6 October 2004.

⁷² The information transmitted by the Secretariat of the DH-PR has been used to fill in questionnaires with respect to the following countries : Austria, the Czech Republic, Malta, Norway, Portugal, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden and Switzerland.

⁷³ Albania, Andorra, the Czech Republic (the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms), Italy, Malta, Portugal, Romania, Slovakia, San Marino (the Declaration of the rights of the citizens and of the fundamental principles of the San Marino legal order), Slovenia, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey (the right is provided only for persons under detention).

⁷⁴ Hungary, Italy, Lithuania, Netherlands, Romania, Serbia and Montenegro, San Marino, Sweden, the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, United Kingdom.

⁷⁵ Countries recognizing the supremacy of international treaties over conflicting national law: Romania, Albania, Andorra, Armenia, Azerbaijan (although international treaties do not take precedence over conflicting constitutional provisions and acts accepted by way of referendum), Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Estonia (although Estonia may not conclude international treaties which are in conflict with its constitution), France, Georgia (as long as the international treaties do not contradict the constitution), Greece, Moldova, the Netherlands, Poland, the Russian Federation, San Marino and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. Countries prioritizing generally recognized principles of international law: Austria, Portugal. Constitutions of some countries provide that their national legislation shall comply with generally accepted principles of international law: Georgia, Hungary, Italy and Slovenia. The Constitution of the Swiss Confederation provides that the Confederation and the Cantons shall respect international law. The Belgian Constitution provides that federal authorities may temporarily substitute themselves for councils and communities “in order to ensure respect of international and supranational obligations”. The Latvian Constitution provides that the State shall “recognize and procedure to speed up the procedures, and the activities of the courts in this respect are under the supervision of the Ministry of Justice (annual reports of the courts, periodical controls etc.).

58. In a number of countries there is no general requirement with respect to the reasonableness of the length of judicial proceedings, but provision is nonetheless made for a maximum time-limit for examining and deciding a case.⁷⁶

59. Generally speaking, in the majority of the Council of Europe member States there is a remedy allowing an individual to complain about the excessive length of proceedings.⁷⁷

60. The remedy may be constituted by a *general action*⁷⁸, in the form, for example, of an action for breach of a constitutional or conventional right, or a civil action for tort against the State.

61. Numerous States provide a specific remedy for the breach of the reasonable time requirement⁷⁹, in the form for instance of a request to accelerate the proceedings in question or an action against the State for the damage caused by non-compliance with the obligation to give a decision within a reasonable delay, or an action aimed at the mitigation of the sentence in criminal proceedings. Some of these countries have established specific remedies after having been faced with the limits of the ordinary legal remedies and having been urged by the findings of the European Court of Human Rights.⁸⁰ Some additional countries are currently preparing legislation aimed at introducing a specific remedy or improving the existing ones.⁸¹

62. In a number of countries, both general and specific remedies are available.⁸²

63. Remedies for excessive length, be they general or specific, are often contained in legislation⁸³; they can be foreseen in the Constitution, when they take the form of an individual complaint before the Constitutional Court⁸⁴; or they can be praetorian⁸⁵.

protect fundamental human rights in accordance with the constitution, laws and international agreements binding upon Latvia”.

⁷⁶ For example in Armenia (the Code of Civil Procedure provides for a fixed timeline for examining and making decision on cases), Azerbaijan (a fixed timeline for examination of cases is established), Georgia (the Code of Criminal Procedure provides for terms of detention, the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the procedural action shall be exercised within a term established by law. In case a procedural term is not established by law, it shall be determined by a court), Norway, Ukraine (the Code of Criminal Procedure provides for terms of pre-trial investigation).

⁷⁷ Save for Armenia, Azerbaijan, Greece, Romania, Turkey.

⁷⁸ Albania, France, Luxembourg, Malta, San Marino, Spain.

⁷⁹ Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Estonia (only in case of delays in administrative proceedings), Finland, Georgia (a disciplinary action may be initiated in case of an unreasonable delay of examination of a case), Italy, Norway, the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

⁸⁰ Croatia, the Czech republic, France (by means of case law), Italy (by means of legislation), Poland, Portugal, Slovakia, Slovenia.

⁸¹ For example the Czech Republic (The draft law modifying the Law No. 82/1998 has been submitted to the Parliament. The draft law provides an adequate compensation for the applicants suffering from undue delays during the proceedings. The draft law will be applied retroactively: if the applicant has his length of proceedings case pending before the European Court, he has the possibility of asking for compensation within one year from the entry into force of the draft law), Hungary (see document CM/Del/OJ/DH (2005) 922, Vol. I, p. 18), Greece (ibidem.), Ukraine. According to the information provided by Mr Francesco Crisafulli, Government Co-Agent of Italy during the Workshop on the improvement of domestic remedies with particular emphasis on cases of unreasonable length of proceedings, held at the initiative of the Polish Chairmanship of the Council of Europe on 28 April 2005, Italy is also working on the improvement of the existing remedies.

⁸² Austria, Andorra, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Belgium, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Germany, Lithuania, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Russian Federation, Serbia and Montenegro (the specific remedy is a measure of internal control and has an administrative character), Slovakia, Slovenia, Sweden, Switzerland, Ukraine, United Kingdom.

64. The precise scope of application and the specific procedural modalities of the different remedies in question vary greatly from one country to the other. They will therefore not be dealt with in detail in this study. The analysis will be limited to a general overview of the domestic remedies currently existing in the Council of Europe member States with respect to allegations of unreasonable delay in administrative, civil and criminal proceedings,⁸⁶ on the basis of the information available,⁸⁷ with a view to identifying the main kinds of remedies available and their main features.

65. Several kinds of categorisation of the remedies available for allegations of excessive length of proceedings are possible.

- Preventive or acceleratory remedies are designed to expedite the proceedings in order to prevent them from becoming excessively lengthy, while compensatory remedies provide the individual with redress for delays that have already occurred (regardless of whether or not the proceedings have ended).
- Pecuniary remedies provide a financial reparation for the damage incurred (material or non-material, or both). Non-pecuniary remedies provide a moral reparation (for example, the acknowledgment of the violation or the mitigation of a sentence).
- Certain remedies are available for both pending and terminated proceedings, and others are only available for pending proceedings. Indeed, when the proceedings are over, acceleratory remedies are clearly of no use, and the remedy may only consist in compensation for the damage resulting from the allegedly excessive duration of proceedings⁸⁸ or in a disciplinary action against the dilatory authority.⁸⁹
- Certain remedies may be applicable to any kind of proceedings (civil, administrative or criminal), while others are applicable only to criminal proceedings.

66. These categories, however, are not clear-cut. It is difficult to say, for example, whether a disciplinary action against a dilatory judge is only a preventive remedy or if it is also compensatory (as the applicant may see it).⁹⁰ Further, these categories often overlap with each other.

⁸³ Andorra, Austria, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Finland, Estonia, France, Georgia, Hungary, Italy, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Norway, Russian Federation, Serbia and Montenegro, Slovakia, Slovenia, Sweden, Spain, Switzerland, the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Ukraine.

⁸⁴ Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Cyprus, Germany, Malta, Slovakia, Slovenia and Spain.

⁸⁵ In France, the remedy envisaged in Article L.781-1 of the Code of Judicial Organisation was considered as being effective only as a result of the developments in the national case law.

⁸⁶ Enforcement proceedings will not be treated.

⁸⁷ The Secretariat has relied on the information submitted by Venice Commission members in reply to the questionnaire (CDL(2004) 124), on the information provided by the Department for the Execution of Judgments of the European Court of Human Rights of Directorate General II of the Council of Europe, by the Registry of the European Court of Human Rights and by the Secretariat of the DH-PR, and on the information it has itself obtained from direct sources or from Permanent Representations.

⁸⁸ Such remedy is available in practice of most countries examined save for Croatia, where the compensation for damage resulting from excessive duration of proceedings can only be claimed for pending proceedings.

⁸⁹ In Bulgaria a disciplinary action against a dilatory authority may be initiated only during pending proceedings.

⁹⁰ While a disciplinary sanction will only concern the personal position of the responsible judge, there being no direct and immediate consequence for the proceedings which have given rise to the complaint, a disciplinary action

67. It should be noted indeed that in most countries different forms of redress coexist and may be applied cumulatively.⁹¹

68. For the sake of simplicity, and in the light of the practical approach which is sought, in the present study the existing national remedies will be presented according to the kind of proceedings (civil/administrative and criminal) to which they are applicable. Due to what has been explained above, some repetitions and inaccuracies will be inevitable.

B. State of Art

1. Remedies available for civil/administrative proceedings

69. In most of the Council of Europe member States, preventive remedies are available for administrative and civil proceedings in the form of the possibility for the party/ies to lodge a request for the acceleration of the proceedings.

70. Such requests for acceleration may be lodged:

- With a superior authority/court, either directly⁹² or through the court dealing with the proceedings. In the latter case the court concerned will transmit it to the competent court/authority⁹³; or
- with the dilatory court.⁹⁴

71. The measures taken in response to the above requests may consist in:

- a) fixing an appropriate time-limit for the relevant authority to
 - i. take a particular procedural step (holding a hearing, obtaining an expert's report, issuing another necessary order or taking an act which the concerned authority has failed to take)⁹⁵, or/and
 - ii. decide on the merits of the case or terminate the proceedings,⁹⁶ or
- b) transferring jurisdiction to a different court or a superior authority.⁹⁷ will most often be preceded by a complaint to a supervisory organ, which can give (generally non-binding) instructions to a dilatory judge. At the same time, the risk of an ensuing disciplinary action may have a certain (although indirect) effect of speeding-up the proceedings in question as well as a general preventive effect.

⁹¹ Almost all countries providing, in case of an excessive delay, for a remedy in the form of an acknowledgment of the violation, foresee this as a general form of redress for all types of proceedings. Both acceleratory and compensatory remedies are always preceded by an ascertainment that the reasonable time requirement has been violated.

⁹² Bulgaria, Estonia, Switzerland.

⁹³ Austria (if the dilatory court takes all the procedural steps specified in the request within four weeks of receipt, and informs the party concerned, the request is deemed withdrawn unless the party declares within two weeks after service of the notification that it wishes to maintain its request), the Czech Republic, Poland, Slovenia (a motion for deadline).

⁹⁴ Denmark, Lithuania, Netherlands. Norway, Slovenia (a supervisory appeal), Spain, Serbia and Montenegro.

⁹⁵ Austria, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia (administrative proceedings), Lithuania, Malta, Poland, Slovakia, Slovenia.

⁹⁶ Austria, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Cyprus, Slovakia.

⁹⁷ This possibility exists in Austria, where a party to administrative proceedings may request that the case be remitted to a superior authority, in the last resort to the Administrative Court, which must then decide itself within a statutory time-limit, and in Cyprus, where the Supreme Court can order a retrial by a different court.

72. In most countries, acceleratory remedies co-exist with compensatory ones.⁹⁸ In a few countries, however, pecuniary compensation for damage remains - thus far - the only possible remedy an applicant can claim in respect of delay of proceedings.⁹⁹

73. Compensation can be sought:

- a) from the same authority which decides on the reasonableness of the length of the proceedings¹⁰⁰
- b) or in separate proceedings.¹⁰¹

74. Reparation may be granted on account of:

- a fault of a judge or another officer of the court,¹⁰²
- the heavy workload of the tribunals,¹⁰³
- an irregularity in the conduct of proceedings, including non-compliance with the obligation to perform an act or give a decision within the statutory time-limit,¹⁰⁴
- an unlawful act or omission committed in the course of proceedings,¹⁰⁵ or, more in general, on account of:

- a malfunctioning of justice or denial of justice,¹⁰⁶ or
- a violation of the right to a hearing within a reasonable time.¹⁰⁷

75. Several high and supreme jurisdictions of member States have expressly declared that a violation of the reasonable time requirement as guaranteed by Article 6 § 1 of the Convention is to be treated as a “fault”, an “unlawful act”, a “malfunctioning of administration of justice”, a “denial of justice”, or an “irregularity in the conduct of proceedings” that engages the responsibility of the State and obliges it to repair the ensuing damage.¹⁰⁸

76. As regards the kind of compensation, it may take different forms: pecuniary compensation (of material or non-material damage or both); assumption of a decision in the applicant’s favour; disciplinary sanction to the dilatory judge; exemption from legal costs¹⁰⁹; lowering of an administrative sanction.¹¹⁰

⁹⁸ Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Finland, Lithuania, Netherlands (to a limited extent only), Poland, Portugal (acceleratory measures are used only in criminal proceedings), Serbia and Montenegro, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain.

⁹⁹ France, Hungary (in theory) and Italy.

¹⁰⁰ Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Cyprus, Denmark, Italy, Malta, Netherlands (in administrative proceedings where a punitive sanction is at issue; there the sanction may be lowered as a means of compensation); Poland, Slovakia, Slovenia

¹⁰¹ Netherlands (tort action); Poland, Spain (the compensation claim may be lodged with the Ministry of Justice after the termination of the main proceedings).

¹⁰² Lithuania, Netherlands.

¹⁰³ Belgium.

¹⁰⁴ The Czech Republic and Slovakia.

¹⁰⁵ Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Sweden.

¹⁰⁶ France, Spain.

¹⁰⁷ Croatia, Italy, Lithuania, Russian Federation, Switzerland.

¹⁰⁸ Belgium, Czech Republic, France, Portugal, Poland.

¹⁰⁹ Denmark.

¹¹⁰ Netherlands.

77. As for pecuniary compensation, in a number of States, it is only awarded for non-material damage, in particular in cases where the proceedings are still pending.¹¹¹

78. As to the amount of pecuniary compensation to which a victim of the excessive length of proceedings may be entitled, its determination generally remains within the discretion of the jurisdiction concerned. Taking into account the fact that when assessing the reasonableness of the duration of proceedings in a case before them, the competent authorities of the member States generally refer to criteria applied by the Court with respect to Article 6 §1 of the Convention, it might be assumed that this will also be the case when they are called to determine the amount of compensation. Yet, such assumption is not certain.¹¹² In fact, only a few replies to the questionnaire specifically indicate that in determining the amount of compensation, the competent authority refers to/relies on the amounts of pecuniary compensation granted by the Court.¹¹³

79. In certain countries, in relation to administrative proceedings, in the event that a public authority fails to take a decision within the prescribed time-limit, it shall be deemed to have made a decision to the applicant's favour.¹¹⁴

80. Finally, the possibility for a party in judicial proceedings to bring a disciplinary action against a dilatory authority is mentioned by a number of States as a remedy in respect of excessive delays in the proceedings.¹¹⁵

2. Remedies available for criminal proceedings

81. In most cases, the above-mentioned remedies described for civil and administrative proceedings are not exclusive of these jurisdictions, but may also be applicable in criminal proceedings¹¹⁶. Therefore, general constitutional or legal actions aiming at the acceleration of the proceedings, the reparation of damages or a disciplinary action against the judge may also derive from an alleged breach of the reasonable length of proceedings in a criminal case.¹¹⁷

82. As for preventive remedies, a characteristic of criminal proceedings is that, in general, the trial phase is preceded by an investigative phase. Depending on the different systems, the investigation might be entrusted to a court or body¹¹⁸ other than the one which must decide on the merits of the case. In this sense, some countries provide for specific preventive remedies

¹¹¹ In Croatia, Poland and Slovakia, pecuniary damages resulting from suffering due to excessively lengthy proceedings can also be awarded. When proceedings are terminated and it can be established that the applicant has been delayed in the enjoyment of certain rights, pecuniary damages may be also given in France, Italy.

¹¹² ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit.

¹¹³ Denmark, Lithuania and Slovakia. In Italy, the level of compensation granted by the national courts for breaches of the reasonable time requirement was problematic to the extent that it was not sufficiently related to that granted by the European Court. (see the Pinto law).

¹¹⁴ Belgium, Italy, Sweden.

¹¹⁵ Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Finland, Georgia, Italy, Lithuania, Portugal, Russian Federation, Serbia and Montenegro, Slovakia, Sweden, the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Ukraine.

¹¹⁶ Unless it results otherwise from the specific scope or nature of the concrete remedy, for example the effect of positive silence is exclusive to administrative proceedings.

¹¹⁷ Therefore the fact that specific information regarding criminal proceedings was only provided for 13 countries - Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, Germany, Netherlands, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom - does not imply that generic remedies are not applicable in such cases.

¹¹⁸ For example investigative judges, prosecution services, police.

which aim at speeding up investigative or pre-trial proceedings by allowing for complaints or requests for acceleration to be lodged with the superior prosecuting or judicial authority.¹¹⁹

83. Measures taken in response to the above mentioned requests range from a dismissal of the application if the delays are unjustifiable, an investigation into the causes of the alleged delays or a request for follow-up reports, to the fixing of a time-limit to conclude the investigative phase, hierarchical instructions between Prosecutors including on how to handle the case, or the adoption of disciplinary measures¹²⁰. Specific preventive remedies related to the trial phase appear to be less common.¹²¹

84. As to compensatory remedies, in criminal proceedings there is a specific form of redress by means of which the excessive delays incurred during the proceedings are taken into account, ex officio or at the request of a party, in the assessment of the appropriate punishment. In some countries this remedy has been incorporated into legislation¹²² whereas in others it appears to have been set out or developed through case-law.¹²³

85. A remedy of this kind is always of a compensatory character, for its effects necessarily derive from the acknowledgement that a delay has already occurred, even if in some countries such effects can be anticipated by discontinuing the proceedings on the grounds of delays before the case is brought to the court that decides on its merits.¹²⁴

86. In the majority of cases, however, the court will consider the issue of the length of proceedings together with the decision on the merits. If a violation of the reasonable time requirement is found to have occurred, the court may decide to give redress, namely by means of:

- a reduction or mitigation of the sentence,¹²⁵

¹¹⁹ For example Belgium (where the request can be lodged not only by the defendant but also by the Attorney General), Bulgaria, Denmark and Portugal (where any party can request that the proceedings before the Prosecution Services or those taking place in a court or before a judge be expedited when the time-limits provided by law for any procedural step are exceeded).

¹²⁰ Disciplinary measures have been referred to in this context as preventive remedies, whereas they may also be considered to be compensatory.

¹²¹ Only Denmark has referred to the possibility of asking the court dealing with the case to schedule it for trial. Belgium expressly refers to the lack of such a legal speeding mechanism.

¹²² For example Belgium, (Article 21ter Preliminary Title of the Criminal Procedure Code), Finland (Criminal Code Chapter 6, Article 7), or Sweden (Chapter 29 Section 5 and Chapter 30 section 4 of the Penal Code) According to the latter, "Courts in criminal cases shall both in their choice of sanction and in their determination of the appropriate punishment, take into account whether an unnaturally long time has elapsed since the commission of the offence".

¹²³ For example, the Estonian Supreme Court or the German Constitutional Court. In the Netherlands, the Supreme Court has developed general guidelines for criminal cases in this respect. In Switzerland the Federal Court has determined the possible consequences of a breach in the reasonable length of proceedings in criminal matters, and specified that the judge must explicitly mention the violation of this principle in his judgment and state what account was taken of it ¹²⁴ For example Belgium, where this decision can be taken by the "Chambre du Conseil" or the "Chambre de Mises en Accusation" before the investigate phase is concluded and the case is passed on to the Court that shall take a decision on the merits. Specific mention must be made to the Statutory rules in England and Scotland which impose time-limits on the institution of proceedings, particularly when individuals charged with crimes are held in custody, and may lead to the barring of prosecution or the discontinuance of proceedings. Notwithstanding their effectiveness, such rules seem more related to the question of statute of limitations and the expiry of overall or specific procedural time-limits (for example, for remand on custody or commencement of the trial) than to the issue of the reasonable length of proceedings. The same comment applies to Switzerland, where the "violation of the "reasonable time" principle may give rise to the release of the defendant when the time-limit for legal action has run out".

¹²⁵ This appears to be the most common effect. See for example Denmark, Estonia, Finland, Germany, Netherlands or the United Kingdom. Belgian law specifies what the reduction of sentence will consist of: a penalty lower than the minimum set by the law will be imposed.

- a mere declaration of guilt;¹²⁶
- an acquittal;¹²⁷ or
- a decision to stay the prosecution or discontinue the proceedings.¹²⁸

87. Finally, this remedy of individual redress may also be applied in administrative proceedings where a punitive sanction is at stake so that the recognition of an excessive duration of proceedings may result in its mitigation.¹²⁹

VI. The assessment of the existing national remedies by the European Court of Human Rights

A. In general

88. Since the requirement of Article 13 constitutes an obligation of result, the Contracting States have some discretion as to the manner in which they provide the relief required¹³⁰: “Subject to monitoring by the Committee of Ministers, the respondent State remains free to choose the means by which it will discharge its legal obligation under Article 46 of the Convention, provided that such means are compatible with the conclusions set out in the Court’s judgment”.

89. Until recently, the Court, respecting the margin of appreciation given to the Contracting States, refrained from indicating a specific form or type of an “effective remedy” with respect to an alleged violation of the right to a hearing within a reasonable time. It nevertheless assessed the remedies available in the Contracting States in the light of the generally established “effectiveness” criteria.¹³¹

90. It should be noted in this respect that, although States often refer to particular types of domestic remedies as being available for allegations of the excessive length of proceedings, according to the Court’s assessments a significant number of these remedies can not be considered as effective in practice.

91. The Court has recently adopted a more directive approach to what remedy is to be considered as effective within the meaning of Article 13 of the Convention. Indeed, it has

¹²⁶ For example Belgium, Denmark (where penalties imposed might be suspended), or Switzerland (where exemption from punishment may be granted even if the defendant is found guilty).

¹²⁷ Case-law seems to favour a restrictive interpretation in the sense that acquittal does not automatically derive from the acknowledgement of a delay in criminal proceedings (see for example Estonia and Finland).

¹²⁸ These remedies are only used “in exceptional cases” (Netherlands, Switzerland, Germany). In the United Kingdom it is usually necessary for the prosecutor to have been at fault in causing the delay and, even then, the trial will be stayed only if the defendant can show that because of the delay a fair trial will not be possible and that he will therefore be prejudiced. The trial would not be stayed if the effects of unfairness could be dealt with in the course of the trial. Similarly, in Belgium to take this decision (which seems to entail the impossibility to rule on the civil action) the delay must have affected the administration of evidence or the defence rights.

¹²⁹ For example Austria, the Netherlands

¹³⁰ See for example, Kaya v. Turkey, judgment of 19/02/1998, ECHR 1998-I, §106, Chahal v. the UK, cit., §145.

¹³¹ The present chapter does not include the Court’s relevant case-law with respect to all member States. In order to provide a general overview of the effectiveness of particular types of existing domestic remedies, it merely invokes several country examples with pertinent illustrations of assessments made by the Court. It is to be noted though that in certain cases, the effectiveness patent is only partial as the concerned remedies can only be used for some types or categories of proceedings (for example, only criminal proceedings in case of Portugal and Spain), for pending proceedings only (for example, in Croatia and Poland), or only with respect to proceedings before lower courts (for example, in Austria, France and Italy).

given explicit indications as to the characteristics which an effective domestic remedy in length-of-proceedings cases should have.¹³²

92. In addition, the Court is increasingly assessing the States' obligations under Article 46 of the Convention. In doing so, it examines draft legislation or intended measures and states whether it finds that these represent "reassuring improvements"¹³³, failing which it could "indicate [...] general measures at national level that could be called for in the execution of [...] a judgment."¹³⁴

93. The Court has expressly encouraged certain respondent States to proceed speedily with a prospected legislative initiative¹³⁵, or to amend the existing range of legal remedies or add new remedies so as to secure genuinely effective redress for violations of that right, following the indications as to the characteristics of an effective remedy given by the Court itself in the judgments.¹³⁶

B. Remedies available for civil/administrative proceedings

a) Remedies found to be effective :

i. Austria

94. The Austrian legal system provides for several acceleratory remedies. In this respect, the Court held that the transfer of jurisdiction to the superior authority in case of a delay by the competent authority in making a decision (as provided for in Section 73 of the General Administrative Procedure Act) constituted an effective remedy to be used for the alleged breach of a reasonable time requirement with respect to administrative proceedings,¹³⁷ although not in every case.¹³⁸

95. In the case of Holzinger v. Austria, the Court found that a request for the superior court to impose an appropriate time-limit for the competent court to take particular procedural steps (under Section 91 of the Austrian Courts Act) could, in principle, constitute an effective and sufficient remedy which had to be used in respect of complaints about the length of court proceedings.¹³⁹

ii. France

96. The Court found, in Giummarra and others v. France, that national case law indicated the existence of an adequate remedy in respect of completed civil proceedings. Thus Article L.781-¹³² ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 183.

¹³³ ECtHR, Lukenda v. Slovenia judgment, cit., § 98.

¹³⁴ ECtHR, Sürmeli v. Germany judgment, cit. § 139.

¹³⁵ ECtHR, Sürmeli v. Germany, cit., § 139.

¹³⁶ ECtHR, Lukenda, cit. § 98.

¹³⁷ Egger v. Austria (dec.), no. 74159/01, 9 October 2003.

¹³⁸ Kern v. Austria, judgment of 24/02/2005.

¹³⁹ Holzinger v. Austria judgment of 30 January 2001, §§ 24-25. On the same date, the Court held in Holzinger v. Austria (No. 2), that this remedy was not effective where there was already a substantial delay by the time the legislation took effect.

1 of the Code of Judicial Organisation as interpreted in the case-law was considered an effective remedy for the purposes of Article 34.1.¹⁴⁰

iii. Italy

97. In its decision *Brusco v. Italy*¹⁴¹, the Court considered that the remedy provided by the “Pinto Act”, which had been introduced in Italy to provide a remedy for the excessive length of proceedings following numerous findings by the ECtHR of breaches (and even a pattern) of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention, was an effective remedy for the purposes of Articles 13 and 35.

98. The level of damages awarded by the Italian courts proved however, in some later cases, to be inadequate, which led the Court to consider this remedy as ineffective.¹⁴² This problem was corrected by the Italian Court of Cassation in a judgment of January 2004, as noted by the Court in its Di Sante v. Italy decision.¹⁴³

99. The Grand Chamber delivered nine judgments against Italy concerning the effectiveness of the Pinto Law¹⁴⁴. The Court (in particular in the pilot judgment of Scordino) outlined the principles which it intended to apply in assessing the effectiveness of domestic remedies. The Court found that the proceedings under the Pinto law were not entirely sufficient and therefore did not deprive the applicants of their victim status for the purpose of bringing a case to Strasbourg.

100. The victim status of the applicants was based principally on the manifestly unreasonable nature of the amounts awarded by the Italian authorities (including sums as low as 8% of what the Court itself would have awarded). In addition, in all these cases, save for Scordino, the Court found it unacceptable that the applicants had waited more than six months to receive the compensation awarded by the national courts.

iv. Poland

101. The Court considered a number of cases concerning the effectiveness of the Polish Law of 17 June 2004 (“the 2004 Act”, according to which, if the superior court finds a violation of Article 6 of the Convention, it instructs the lower court to take measures to accelerate the proceedings and/or awards the complainant compensation), which Poland introduced as a remedy for excessive length of proceedings cases in response to judgments of the ECtHR. In the leading decisions of *Michalak v. Poland*¹⁴⁵ and *Charzynski v. Poland*¹⁴⁶, the Court held that the applicants were required to exhaust this remedy before bringing their ¹⁴⁰ Giummarra v. France, judgment of 12 June 2000; Broca Texier-Micault v. France judgment of 21 October 2003 (with respect to administrative proceedings).

¹⁴¹ ECtHR, Brusco v. Italy, decision of 6 September 2001.

¹⁴² ECtHR, Scordino and ors. (no. 1) v. Italy, decision of 27 March 2003.

¹⁴³ ECtHR, Di Sante v. Italy decision of 24 June 2004. The Court took the view that this new development in national law became widely known to the public should by 26 July 2004: applications lodged after this date would therefore be barred for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies.

¹⁴⁴ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy, cit., Cocchiarella v. Italy judgment, cit.; Riccardi Pizzati v. Italy judgment, cit.; Musci v. Italy judgment; Giuseppe Mustacciolo v. Italy (no. 1) judgment, cit.; Procaccini v. Italy judgment, cit.; Zullo Ernestina v. Italy judgment, cit.; Apicella v. Italy judgment, cit.; Giuseppe Mustacciolo v. Italy (no. 2) judgment, cit..

¹⁴⁵ ECtHR, Michalak v. Poland, decision of 1 March 2005.

¹⁴⁶ ECtHR, Charzynski v. Poland, decision of 1 March 2005.

case to Strasbourg. This applied even to applications registered with the Court before the entry into force of the 2004 Act, given that the latter explicitly allowed complaints to be lodged by those who had already brought a case to Strasbourg, provided that the Court had not already adopted a decision on the admissibility of the case. The Court further stated that the 2004 Act was capable of preventing alleged violations of the right to a hearing within a reasonable time and of providing adequate redress for any violation that had already occurred.

v. Portugal

102. In its decision in the case of Paulino Tomás v. Portugal,¹⁴⁷ the Court ruled that an action in tort against the State for excessive length of civil proceedings, based on Legislative Decree 48051 of 21 November 1967, could be said to constitute an effective remedy within the meaning of Article 35 of the Convention only after the publication of the judgment in the Pires Nino case in which the administrative court held that the excessive length of proceedings could constitute grounds for State responsibility.

b) Remedies found to be non effective

i. Bulgaria

103. The Court considered that a complaint based on the direct applicability of the Convention in Bulgarian law, as well as a “complaint about delays” (introduced with the adoption of new Article 217a of the Code of Civil Procedure of Bulgaria in July 1999, according to which a litigant was allowed to apply to the chairperson of the higher court when the examination of the case, the delivery of judgment or the transmitting of an appeal against the judgment was unduly delayed, and the chairperson had the power to issue binding instructions to the court examining the case), was not an effective remedy within the meaning of Article 13 of the Convention.¹⁴⁸

104. As regards the possibility to make informal complaints to the Supreme Administrative Court and to the Ministry of Justice, the Court held that these could not be described as a remedy. “The possibility to appeal to various authorities in the absence of a specific procedure cannot be regarded as an effective remedy, because such appeals aim to urge the authorities to utilise their discretion and do not give litigants a personal right to compel the State to exercise its supervisory powers”.¹⁴⁹

ii. Czech Republic

105. The Court assessed the effectiveness of a constitutional appeal, as well as of an action for damages against the State under Law no. 82/1998. According to the Czech legislation, the Constitutional Court, in case of finding that proceedings which have led to a constitutional appeal have been held up by delays imputable to a particular court, can order the latter to put an end to the delays and continue the proceedings. In the Court’s view, while such an order may speed up the proceedings in question if it is acted upon immediately, the Czech legislation does not envisage any sanction for failure to comply, thus depriving the Constitutional Court of the possibility to take practical steps to expedite the proceedings. Neither can the Constitutional Court award any compensation for delays that have already occurred.

¹⁴⁷ Tomás v. Portugal, no. 58698/00, decision of 27 March 2003, ¹⁴⁸ Rachevi v. Bulgaria, judgment of 23/12/2004, § 100.

¹⁴⁹ Dimitrov v. Bulgaria, judgment of 23/09/2006, § 80.

106. As for the possibility of bringing an action for damages against the State under Law no. 82/1998, the applicant can not be awarded compensation for non-pecuniary damage. Therefore it can not provide adequate redress for violation.¹⁵⁰

107. Neither can appeals to a higher authority be regarded as an effective remedy since they do not give litigants a personal right to compel the State to exercise its supervisory powers.¹⁵¹

108. The remedies provided for in the Czech legislation are therefore assessed by the Court as being non-effective, since they do not make it possible to compel the court to expedite proceedings or to provide compensations for damages.¹⁵²

iii. Germany

109. In a recent case, the Court examined the effectiveness of four remedies which existed in German law against the undue length of civil proceedings. In respect of the constitutional complaint, the Court observed that the right to expeditious proceedings was guaranteed by the German Basic Law and that a violation of that right could be alleged before the Federal Constitutional Court. Where that court found that proceedings had taken an excessive time, it declared their length unconstitutional and requested the court concerned to expedite or conclude them. However, the Federal Court was not empowered to set deadlines for the lower court or to order other measures to speed up the proceedings in issue; nor was it able to award compensation. Under these circumstances, the Court found that a constitutional complaint had not been proved to be capable of affording redress for the excessive length of pending civil proceedings.

110. As regards an appeal to a higher authority, the Court noted that the Government had not advanced any relevant reasons to warrant the conclusion that that remedy, provided for in the German Judiciary Act, would have been capable of expediting the proceedings in question.

111. As regards a special complaint alleging inaction, this remedy had no statutory basis in German law. Although a considerable number of courts of appeal had accepted it in principle, the admissibility criteria for it were variable and depended on the circumstances of the case. The Federal Court of Justice, for its part, had yet to give a ruling on the admissibility of such a remedy. Having regard to the uncertainty about the admissibility criteria for this remedy and to its practical effect on the proceedings in question, the Court considered that no particular relevance should be attached to the fact that the Court of Appeal had not ruled out such a remedy in principle. Moreover, the Federal Constitutional Court had not declared the applicant's constitutional complaints inadmissible for failure to exhaust domestic remedies. Accordingly, the Court concluded that a special complaint alleging inaction could not be regarded as an effective remedy in the applicant's case.

112. Finally, as concerns an action for damages, the Court noted that a single judicial decision, such as the one relied upon by the Government, was not a sufficient indication that there had been an effective remedy available in theory and in practice. In any event, the Court noted that even if the courts before which an action for damages was brought were to conclude that there had been a breach of judicial duties on account of excessively lengthy proceedings, they would not be able to make an award in respect of non-pecuniary damage, whereas in cases concerning the length of civil proceedings the applicants above all sustained damage under that head. The Court therefore considered that none of the four remedies advocated by the ¹⁵⁰ Hartman v. the Czech Republic, judgment of 03/12/2003, §§ 67-68.

¹⁵¹ Idem. § 66.

¹⁵² Idem. §§ 81-84. Bartl v. the Czech Republic, judgment of 22/06/2004, Idem. § 58, Konečný v. the Czech Republic, judgment of 26/10/2004, § 85.

Government could be considered effective within the meaning of Article 13. Nor could the aggregate of these remedies be so considered.

iv. Russia

113. In Kormacheva v. Russia the Court determined that the recourse to the higher judicial and other authorities could not be regarded as effective remedy since it could neither expedite the determination of the case nor provide the applicant for the adequate redress for delays already occurred. In the Court's view, the disciplinary action concerned the personal position of the responsible judges, but did not result in any direct and immediate consequence for the proceedings. The Court therefore concluded that the applicant had no domestic remedy whereby she could enforce her right to a "hearing within a reasonable time" as guaranteed by Article 6 § 1 of the Convention¹⁵³.

v. Slovenia

114. The Slovenian legal system sets out a number of remedies that may be used in respect of delays in court proceedings. In Lukenda v. Slovenia the Court had to determine whether an administrative action¹⁵⁴, a claim for damages in civil proceedings, a request for supervision and a constitutional appeal, taken individually or in aggregate, could be considered effective legal remedies within the meaning of Article 35 of the Convention.

115. According to the Court, the Government failed to show clearly that the judgments and decisions of the administrative courts could speed up unduly protracted proceedings or award reparation for violations that had already occurred. The absence of specific measures (i.e. to decide a case or take specific procedural measures within a fixed time-limit) to expedite the procedures was also stressed by the Court in Belinger v. Slovenia.¹⁵⁵

116. As for the claim for tort the Court considered that it could only provide redress when the main proceedings had already been ended. Even in these cases the Government failed to show that compensation for non-pecuniary damage could be awarded.

117. As regards the remedy under section 72 of the Judicature Act, the Court held that the request for supervision was a measure in the framework of judicial administration and not within the judicial system.¹⁵⁶ The remedy did not provide for a guarantee to accelerate procedures, or provide redress in the form of compensation. At the same time the measure did not have any legally binding effect on the court concerned.¹⁵⁷ Moreover no right of appeal was provided by the legislation.

118. Finally, in respect of the constitutional complaint the Court stressed that a constitutional appeal, in principle, could only be lodged after domestic remedies (an administrative action or a claim for tort) had been exhausted. In the Belinger case the Court found that the efficiency of ¹⁵³ Kormacheva v. Russia, judgment of 14/07/2004, §§ 61-64.

¹⁵⁴ However in Sirc v. Slovenia case (decision of 16 May 2002) where the court dealt with the length of proceedings before administrative organs, the Court found that in the event of lack of reply from the administrative authority, the applicant can and should seek a decision directly from the Administrative Court. This remedy was therefore found effective for proceedings before administrative authorities.

¹⁵⁵ Decision of 2/10/2001.

¹⁵⁶ Belinger v. Slovenia, decision of 2/10/2001.

¹⁵⁷ Belinger v. Slovenia, decision of 2/10/2001

the constitutional appeal was already problematic in view of the probable length of the combined proceedings. The opinion was confirmed in Lukenda v. Slovenia.

C. Remedies available for criminal proceedings

a) Remedies found to be effective

i. Austria

119. The remedy mentioned in paragraph 95 above are applicable also to criminal proceedings.

ii. Denmark

120. In Ohlen v. Denmark,¹⁵⁸ the Court found that the redress afforded at domestic level (reduction of sentence) for the violation of the applicant's right to trial within reasonable time was adequate and sufficient.

ii. Germany

121. The mechanism established in the German case-law, whereby redress is given by taking the breach of the reasonable time requirement into account when determining the sentence, was considered as being "capable of proving suitable". However, the Court also noted that the national jurisdiction must clearly acknowledge that a specific measure of redress that has been taken, is directly linked with the over-stepping of the "reasonable time" in the meaning of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention.¹⁵⁹

iii. Norway

122. The Court held that "the mitigation of a sentence on the ground of the excessive length of proceedings does not in principle deprive the individual concerned of his status as a victim within the meaning of Article 34 of the Convention. However this general rule is subject to an exception when the national authorities have acknowledged in a sufficiently clear way the failure to observe the reasonable time requirement and have afforded redress by reducing the sentence in an express and measurable manner".¹⁶⁰ Thus, the delay element being a direct factor for making a decision on mitigation of the sentence, the Court considered the remedy to be effective.

iv. Portugal

123. In its judgment *Tomé Mota v. Portugal*¹⁶¹ the Court held that an interlocutory application by which the Judicial Service Commission or the Attorney-General is requested to fix a time-limit for taking a procedural measure which the competent court or public prosecutor have failed to take, as envisaged in Articles 108 and 109 of the Portuguese Code of Criminal procedure, constituted an effective remedy to be exhausted by an applicant.

b) Remedies found to be non effective

¹⁵⁸ ECtHR, Ohlen v. Denmark, judgment of 24 May 2005.

¹⁵⁹ ECtHR, Eckle v. Germany, judgment of 15 July 1982, § 94.

¹⁶⁰ ECtHR, Beck v. Norway, judgment of 26 September 2001.

¹⁶¹ ECtHR, Tomé Mota v. Portugal decision of 2 December 1999.

i. Bulgaria

124. After having examined the effectiveness of the remedies in respect of the unreasonable length of criminal proceedings in Bulgaria¹⁶², the Court concluded that the possibility of an appeal to the various levels of the prosecution authorities (such as the District Prosecutor's Office, the Regional Prosecutor's Office, or the Chief Prosecutor's Office) could not be regarded as an effective remedy since such hierarchical appeals aimed to urge the authorities to utilise their discretion and do not give litigants a personal right to compel the State to exercise its supervisory powers.

ii. Finland

125. In *Kangasluoma v. Finland*¹⁶³ the Court had to determine whether the remedies set in the Finnish legislation could meet the "effectiveness" criteria. The Court found that the remedies referred to by the government such as a complaint to the Chancellor of Justice or the Parliamentary Ombudsman, as well as submission of a request to accelerate proceedings to the court considering the case could not be regarded as being effective both in law and in practice. As for a possibility of an action in tort, it could not be considered as effective within the meaning of Article 13, since a mere delay, where no erroneous or negligent act had been committed and where the delay had not resulted in any damage, was not as such a ground for compensation.

iii. Ireland

126. In its judgment *Barry v. Ireland*¹⁶⁴ the Court held that the judicial review proceedings were not capable of expediting the decision by the criminal courts. The aim of the judicial review proceedings was to stay future criminal proceedings, not to expedite them. Moreover the judicial review proceedings themselves were not sufficiently swift to be preventative of future delay.¹⁶⁵ They were neither capable of providing adequate redress for delays that had already occurred.

127. Furthermore according to the Court "the judgment of the Supreme Court made clear that, in determining the applicant's judicial review proceedings (based on, inter alia, delay), the domestic courts would not take into account delays caused by any national authorities other than the D.P.P. Given that the judicial authorities (both the judiciary and the authorities responsible for listing cases) were responsible for a considerable part of the delay in this case, this is a further reason for concluding that the remedy of judicial review cannot be considered an effective one."¹⁶⁶

iv. Ukraine

¹⁶² ECtHR, Djangozov v. Bulgaria judgment of 8 July 2004.

¹⁶³ Judgment of 14 June 2004

¹⁶⁴ ECtHR, Barry v. Ireland, judgment of 15/03/2006

¹⁶⁵ ECtHR, Doran v. Ireland, §§ 57 and 65.

¹⁶⁶ ECtHR, Barry v. Ireland, cit., §55.

128. The Court surveyed the existing remedies available in the Ukrainian legal system and found there were no effective and accessible remedies which could be used to obtain redress for the excessive length of the criminal proceedings.¹⁶⁷

129. In respect of the possibility to file complaints with the superior prosecutor provided by the Ukrainian legislation, the Court observed that the latter could not be considered effective and accessible since the status of the prosecutor in the domestic law and his participation in the criminal proceedings against the applicant did not offer adequate safeguards for an independent and impartial review of the applicant's complaints.

130. The Court noted that, although since the amendment of 21 June 2001 (with effect as from 29 June 2001), Article 234 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of Ukraine provided for the possibility to complain to the courts about the resolutions of an investigating officer/prosecutor in the course of the administrative hearing or in the course of the consideration of the case on the merits, this remedy did not satisfy the criteria of accessibility, as it suggested that complaints against the length of the investigation of the case could be made after the investigation had finished, but left no possibility of appeal in the course of the investigation. As to the amendments to Article 234 of the Code of Criminal procedure, allowing for complaints to be lodged in the course of the investigation, the Court held that the Government failed to show what its practical implications were. The law did not specifically state whether Article 234 was a remedy for the length of proceedings in a criminal case and what kind of redress could be provided to an applicant in the event of a finding that the length of the investigation breached the requirement of "reasonableness".¹⁶⁸

VII. The requirements of Article 13 of the Convention in respect of unreasonably lengthy proceedings according to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights

131. The Strasbourg Court, in assessing the effectiveness of various domestic remedies in respect of the excessive length of proceedings, has elaborated several criteria and principles. Recently, the Court has even given certain explicit indications as to the characteristics which an effective domestic remedy in length-of-proceedings cases should have. It did so "in so far as the parties appear to link the issue of victim status to the more general question of effectiveness of the remedy and seek guidelines on affording the most effective domestic remedies possible".¹⁶⁹

132. The Venice Commission welcomes the Court's willingness to provide such explicit indications. It recalls that, in its opinion on the implementation of judgments of the European Court of Human Rights, it had expressed the view that it would be appropriate for the Court "to address the question of whether and to what extent concrete reparation is possible, prior to examining whether and to what extent it is appropriate to award, instead or in addition, just satisfaction." And that "the Court would need to give indications as to what would constitute adequate reparation in the type of case under consideration, in order to express its view as to whether such reparation would be possible, wholly or in part, under the applicable national legislation."¹⁷⁰

¹⁶⁷ ECtHR, Merit v. Ukraine, judgment of 30 October 2004.

¹⁶⁸ § 65.

¹⁶⁹ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 182.

¹⁷⁰ CDL-AD(2002)34, §§ 64-71.

133. Guidance by the Court will certainly assist States in providing for an “incontestably” effective remedy in their domestic legal system¹⁷¹.

134. Below is an outline of the principles which can be derived to-date from the case-law of the Strasbourg Court.

A. As regards the kind of remedy

135. As was previously underlined, in terms of the Court’s case-law, it is an obligation of result that is required by Article 13. Even when none of the remedies available to an individual, taken alone, would satisfy the requirements of Article 13, the aggregate of remedies provided for under domestic law may be considered as “effective” in terms of this article.¹⁷²

136. The Court has indicated in the first place that “the best solution [to the problem of excessive length of proceedings] in absolute terms is indisputably, as in many spheres, prevention.”¹⁷³

137. Where the judicial system of a State is deficient in terms of ensuring compliance with the reasonable time requirement, “a remedy designed to expedite the proceedings in order to prevent them from becoming excessively lengthy is the most effective solution. Such a remedy offers an undeniable advantage over a remedy affording only compensation, since it also prevents a finding of successive violations in respect of the same set of proceedings and does not merely repair the breach a posteriori, as does a compensatory remedy [...]”¹⁷⁴

138. While stating expressly that such acceleratory remedy would be “the most effective solution”, the Court has refrained from indicating that the provision of such a remedy is required by Article 13 of the Convention. This reluctance is, no doubt, in conformity with the general principles of international law and motivated by the need to afford the Contracting States a certain discretion as to the manner in which they provide individuals with the relief required by Article 13 and conform to their Convention obligation under that provision.¹⁷⁵

139. The Court does, however, express a clear preference for an acceleratory remedy over a mere compensatory remedy, at least within legal systems which have consistently proven unable to secure the right to a trial within a reasonable time. In this respect, it may be taken that the Court’s position has somewhat shifted from that previously expressed¹⁷⁶ that Article 13 offers an alternative between a remedy which can be used to expedite a decision by the courts dealing with the case, and a remedy which can provide the litigant with adequate redress for delays that have already occurred. The latter, in fact, only offer an a posteriori remedy and are unable to prevent successive violations.

140. The same preference for an acceleratory remedy has been expressed by the United Nations Human Rights Committee, which has stated that all stages of judicial proceedings must take place without undue delay and that, to make this right effective, a procedure must be available to ensure that this applies in all instances. Furthermore, according to the Committee,

¹⁷¹ ECtHR, Cocchiarella v. Italy judgment [GC] of 29 March 2006, § 60

¹⁷² See para. 9 above.

¹⁷³ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., §183; Sürmeli v. Germany judgment, cit., § 100..

¹⁷⁴ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 183.

¹⁷⁵ ECtHR, Kaya v. Turkey, judgment of 19/02/1998, ECHR 1998-I, §106, Chalal v. the UK, cit., §145; Kudla v. Poland, cit., § 154.

¹⁷⁶ ECtHR, Kudla v. Poland, cit. § 158; Mifsud v. France, decision of 11 September 2002, Reports 2002-VIII, § 17, Djangozov v. Bulgaria, cit., § 47, Paulino Tomas v. Portugal, Decision of 22 May 2003, Reports 2003-VIII, p. 9.

“the mere possibility of obtaining compensation after, and independently of, a trial that was unduly prolonged does not constitute an effective remedy” for the purposes of the International Covenant on Political and Civil Rights.¹⁷⁷

141. Where “the proceedings have clearly already been excessively long”, mere prevention may not be adequate.¹⁷⁸ In this case, compensatory remedies may be appropriate instead.

142. Indeed, the Court indicates that a combination of two types of remedy, one designed to expedite the proceedings and the other to afford compensation, may appear as the best solution.¹⁷⁹

143. A compensatory remedy may take the form of financial reparation of the damage (pecuniary and non-pecuniary) suffered.

144. Other kinds of “compensatory” remedy may constitute an appropriate redress for the violation of the reasonable time requirement and an “effective remedy” in the sense of Article 13. This is true, for example, for a discontinuance of the prosecution,¹⁸⁰ a mitigation of sentence,¹⁸¹ an exemption from paying legal costs,¹⁸² an acquittal,¹⁸³ the suspension of the sentence, the lowering of a fine and the non-deprivation of civil and political rights¹⁸⁴ (possibly more than one form of redress being applied at the same time). These measures must be taken in an express and measurable manner.¹⁸⁵

145. The quashing of a ruling on a procedural issue (including the non respect of the relevant time-limit) following complaints by the applicant does not amount to an appropriate redress to the extent that it is irrelevant for and incapable of expediting the proceedings or providing the applicant with redress for the delays occurred.¹⁸⁶

146. The favourable outcome of the proceedings as such cannot be considered to constitute adequate redress for their length.¹⁸⁷

147. A disciplinary action against the dilatory judge may amount to an effective remedy against the length of the proceedings in terms of Article 13 of the Convention only if it has a “direct and immediate consequence for the proceedings which have given rise to the complaint”. This ¹⁷⁷ See the UN Committee on Human Rights' General Comment 13 (Article 14), § 10, 21 session 1984 (Compilation of General Comments and General Recommendations Adopted by Human Rights Treaty Bodies, UN Doc. HRI/GEN/1/Rev.1 at 14 (1994). This view was confirmed in its conclusions of 31 October 2002, on the application no. 864/1999, Alfonso Ruiz Agudo v. Spain, § 9.1.

¹⁷⁸ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 185.

¹⁷⁹ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 186.

¹⁸⁰ ECtHR, Eckle v. Germany judgment of 15 July 1982, Series A no. 51, §§ 66-67 and 94; European Commission on Human Rights, Conrad v. Germany, decision of 13/04/1988, D.R., 56, p. 264; G. v. Germany, decision of 6/07/1983, D.R., 33, p.5.

¹⁸¹ ECtHR, Eckle v. Germany, cit., § 66-67. See also, Van Laak v. Netherlands, decision of 31 March 1993, D.R., 74 p. 156; Hozee v. Netherlands, judgment of 22 May 1998, § 54; Beck v. Norway, judgment of 26 September 2001, ECHR 404, § 27; Ohlen v. Denmark judgment of 24 February 2005, § 27.

¹⁸² ECtHR, Ohlen v. Denmark judgment, § 28.

¹⁸³ Eur. Commission on Human Rights, Byrn v. Denmark, report of 16 February 1993, § 21.

¹⁸⁴ ECtHR, Morby v. Luxembourg (dec.), 13 November 2003.

¹⁸⁵ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 186.

¹⁸⁶ ECtHR, Kuzin v. Russian Federation judgment of 9 June 2005, § 45.

¹⁸⁷ ECtHR, Kuzin v. Russian Federation judgment, cit. § 45; mutatis mutandis Eur. Comm. H.R., Byrn v. Denmark, decision of 1 July 1992, DR 74, p. 5.

entails that the disciplinary action must present certain specific features. There must be an obligation for the supervisory organ to take up the matter with the dilatory judge, if a complaint is lodged. The applicant must be a party to the proceedings. The effect of any decision taken must not merely concern the personal position of the responsible judge.¹⁸⁸

148. Whatever form the redress takes, it must be coupled with the acknowledgement of the occurred violation. Indeed, the national jurisdiction must acknowledge that the reasonable-time requirement has not been met and a specific measure has to be taken with the aim of repairing the over-stepping of the “reasonable time” in the meaning of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention.¹⁸⁹ This acknowledgement needs to be made “in substance at least”¹⁹⁰.

149. Such acknowledgement is an indispensable, though not a sufficient,¹⁹¹ component of any effective remedy set up under Articles 6 and 13 of the Convention.¹⁹²

150. In conclusion, according to the Strasbourg Court, States have to:

- organise their legal system so as to prevent unreasonable procedural delays from taking place;
- if excessive delays occur, acknowledge the violation of Article 6 of the Convention and provide adequate redress;
- when their legal system is deficient in terms of reasonableness of the length of proceedings, provide an acceleratory remedy;
- if they chose not to do this, and also in cases when excessive delays have indeed already taken place, provide a compensatory remedy, in the form of either financial compensation or other forms such as mitigation of the sentence and discontinuance of the prosecution.

B. As regards the legal basis for the remedy and its clarity/accessibility

151. Article 13 does not require the provision of a specific remedy in respect of the excessive length of proceedings;¹⁹³ a general constitutional or legal action, such as an action to establish non-contractual liability on the part of the State, may be sufficient. Such action, however, must be effective both in law and in practice.

152. In the absence of a specific legal basis, the availability of a remedy and its scope of application must be clearly set out and confirmed or complemented by the practice of the competent organs and/or through appropriate case-law.¹⁹⁴

153. Whatever measure may be ordered by a competent authority, a domestic remedy in respect of unreasonable delays will conform to the requirements of the Convention only when it ¹⁸⁸ ECtHR, Kormacheva v. Russia judgment of 29 January 2004, § 62.

¹⁸⁹ ECtHR, Eckle v. Germany, cit., § 94, Beck v. Norway, cit., § 27.

¹⁹⁰ ECtHR, Cocchiarella v. Italy judgment of 29 March 2006, §§ 84-85.

¹⁹¹ ECtHR, Eckle v. Germany, cit., § 70; Ohlen v. Denmark, cit., § 30.

¹⁹² ECtHR, Ohlen v. Denmark, cit., § 27; Eckle v. Germany judgment of 15 July 1982, Series A no. 51, § 66; Beck v. Norway judgment 26 June 2001, § 27; Graaskov Jensen v. Denmark (dec.), no. 48470/99, ECHR 2001-X and Normann v. Denmark (dec.), no. 44704/98, 14 June 2001; Morby v. Luxembourg (dec.), cit..

¹⁹³ ECtHR, A.M. Paulino Tomas v. Portugal, decision of 22 May 2003; Broca and Texier-Micault v. France judgment of 21 October 2003, § 18.

¹⁹⁴ See, for example, ECtHR, Soc v. Croatia judgment of 9 May 2003, § 94.

has acquired a sufficient legal certainty, in theory and in practice, which would have enabled the applicant to use it at the date on which an application is lodged with the Court.¹⁹⁵

154. If the remedy is set up through legislation, it will acquire “a sufficient level of certainty” on the date of entry into force of that legislation, independently of the existence of any case-law confirming its applicability, provided that the wording of the legal text in question is clear and indicates that it is specifically designed to address the issue of the excessive length of proceedings before the domestic authorities.¹⁹⁶ Mere doubts as to the effective functioning of a newly created statutory remedy does not dispense the applicant from having recourse to it.¹⁹⁷

155. If the effectiveness of a general remedy in respect of claims of unreasonable duration of proceedings is acquired or proved after its entry into force through specific case-law, a certain lapse of time after the judgment concerned may be necessary before a sufficient level of certainty is acquired. Such length of time may vary.¹⁹⁸

156. In respect of a remedy consisting in providing financial compensation for the excessive length of proceedings, the legal basis for the State’s liability to pay damages and the criteria of how such damages would be calculated or what amount of damages could be expected must be clear.¹⁹⁹

C. As regards the general characteristics of the remedial procedure

157. A remedy in respect of the excessive length of judicial proceedings must be effective, sufficient and accessible.²⁰⁰

158. A national “complaint about delays” must not be merely theoretical: there must exist sufficient case-law proving that the application can actually result in the acceleration of a procedure or in adequate redress.²⁰¹

¹⁹⁵ See, among many others, the Giummarra and Others v. France judgment (cit.), where the Court has held that having regard to the developments in the case-law, the possibility to request reparation of damages resulting from breach of the reasonable time requirement was an effective remedy for the purposes of Article 34§1, only for those applications that are lodged with the Court before 20 September 1999 (emphasis added). The reference to the date on which the application was lodged is subject to exceptions which may be justified by the particular circumstances of each case (see Baumann v. France, judgment of 22 May 2001, Reports 2001-V, §47) or when a specific remedy was clearly designed to address, inter alia, the problem of the unreasonable delay of proceedings, as was the case in Croatia, Italy and Slovakia (see, for example, Giacometti and Others v. Italy, decision of 8 November 2001, Reports 2001/XII; Nogolica v. Croatia, decision of 5 September 2002 and Andrasik v. Slovakia, cit.).

¹⁹⁶ ECtHR, Slavicek v. Croatia, dec., 4 July 2002.

¹⁹⁷ ECtHR, Krasuski v. Poland judgment of 14 June 2005, § 71.

¹⁹⁸ The Strasbourg Court held that six months had been sufficient for the first judgment of the French Conseil d'Etat holding the State responsible for a breach of the reasonable time requirement to become legally certain (ECtHR, Broca and Texier-Micault v. France, cit.); six months were equally sufficient for a judgment of the Italian Court of Cassation bringing the fixing of the level of reparation for breach of the reasonable time requirement into line with European case-law to become known to the general public (ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 147). An action to establish non-contractual liability on the part of the State in Portugal acquired, in the view of the Strasbourg Court, a sufficient degree of legal certainty one year after the judgment of the Supreme Administrative Court accepting for the first time that the State could be held liable under Article 6 of the Convention for the length of judicial proceedings, was rendered (ECtHR, Paulino Tomas v. Portugal, cit.).

¹⁹⁹ ECtHR, Doran v. Ireland, cit. §§ 65-66.

²⁰⁰ ECtHR, Paulino Tomas v. Portugal, cit. ; see also Belinger v. Slovenia, decision of 2/10/2001.

²⁰¹ ECtHR, Doran v. Ireland, cit. ; Timar v. Hungary, decision of 19 March 2002; Horvat v. Croatia, cit., §§ 37-39.

159. In the absence of specific case-law, a remedy may be considered “effective” when the wording of the legislation in question clearly indicates that it is specifically designed to address the issue of the excessive length of proceedings before the domestic authorities.²⁰²

160. The possibility to apply to a higher authority for speeding-up proceedings (imposing an appropriate time-limit for the taking of necessary procedural steps or putting forward a hearing) will not be considered effective in the absence of a specific procedure, when the result of such application depends on the discretion of the authority concerned and where the applicant is not given the right to compel the State to exercise its supervisory powers.²⁰³

161. The efficiency and sufficiency requirements entail in particular that the duration of the remedial procedure needs to be reasonably short, and indeed requires “special attention” on the part of the competent authorities in order to avoid infringements of Article 6 in this respect (this applies to the remedial procedure).²⁰⁴ An unreasonable duration of the remedial procedure may amount to a disproportionate hurdle to the effective exercise by an applicant of the right to individual application within the meaning of Article 34 of the Convention and exempt an individual from the obligation to exhaust it.²⁰⁵

162. The duration of the phase of enforcement of decisions on the reasonable time requirement is crucial: the payment of the awarded compensation must be made within six months from the date when the relevant domestic decision becomes enforceable.²⁰⁶ Indeed, in order to be effective, a compensatory remedy must be accompanied by an adequate budgetary provision so that effect can be given to decisions of the court awarding compensation within six months of their being deposited with the registry (or from the date when they become enforceable).²⁰⁷

163. With regard to the requirement that a remedy affording compensation complies with the reasonable-time requirement, it may well be that the procedural rules are not exactly the same as for ordinary applications for damages. It is for each State to determine, on the basis of the ²⁰² ECtHR, Slavicek v. Croatia, cit., p.3. For the argument a contrario, see Ohlen v. Denmark, decision of 6/03/2003, where the Court considered that «the wording of the invoked sections of the Act does not provide lucidity as to speculation on the effectiveness of such an action in a case like the present one», p. 8.

²⁰³ ECtHR Djanzozov v. Bulgaria, decision of 8 October 2004; Horvat v. Croatia, cit., § 47; Hartman v. the Czech Republic, judgment of 10 July 2003, § 82; Nuvoli v. Italy judgment of 16 May 2002, § 35.

²⁰⁴ ECtHR, Paulino Tomas v. Portugal, cit.; Gouveia da Siva Torrado v. Portugal (dec.), 22 May 2003.

²⁰⁵ ECtHR, Vaney v. France judgment of 30 November 2004, p. 9 (the remedial procedure had lasted more than ten years. A number of applications directed against Italy and raising the issue of the unreasonable duration of the remedial procedure under the Pinto law have been declared inadmissible: ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 208 (four months); Pelli v. Italy, dec., 13 November 2003 (eighteen months); Cataldo v. Italy, dec., 3 June 2004 (two years and five months including the enforcement phase); Tomaselli v. Italy, dec., 18 March 2004 (one year and four months).

²⁰⁶ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy, cit., § 198. The Court underlined that under the Pinto law such decisions are immediately enforceable. In a series of Italian cases, the Court found the duration of the phase of enforcement of the decisions finding a breach of the reasonable time requirement to be unacceptable and considered was found by the Strasbourg Court to be unacceptable; this factor, coupled with the excessive legal fees and the insufficient level of compensation, led the Court to consider that the redress afforded in domestic law was insufficient and the applicants had not lost their victim status (ECtHR, Cocchiarella v. Italy judgment, cit., §§ 99-100 (seven months plus more than three years to obtain enforcement); Riccardi Pizzati v. Italy judgment, cit., §§ 98-99 (fourteen months plus 22 months to obtain enforcement); Musci v. Italy judgment, cit., §§ 100-101 (eight months plus 23 to obtain enforcement); Giuseppe Mustacciolo v. Italy (no. 1) judgment, cit., §§ 98-99 (eight months plus fifteen to obtain enforcement); Procaccini v. Italy judgment, cit., §§ 97-98 (eight months plus more than three years to obtain compensation); Zullo Ernestina v. Italy judgment, cit., §§ 101-102 (seven months plus 23 Months to obtain enforcement) Apicella v. Italy judgment, cit., §§ 97-98 (seven months plus eleven to obtain enforcement); Giuseppe Mustacciolo v. Italy (no. 2) judgment, cit., §§ 97-98 (nine months plus fourteen months to obtain enforcement).

²⁰⁷ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 209.

rules applicable in its judicial system, which procedure will best meet the requirement of “effectiveness”, provided that the procedure conforms to the principles of fairness guaranteed by Article 6 of the Convention.²⁰⁸

164. Special rules concerning legal costs (particularly fixed expenses such as the fees of registration of judicial decisions) in the remedial procedure would be appropriate (lower than in ordinary proceedings) in order to avoid that excessive costs may constitute an unreasonable restriction on the right to lodge such claims.²⁰⁹

165. Reparation refers to both pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage. The existence and quantum of the pecuniary damage are to be determined by the domestic courts. As for the non-pecuniary damage, there is a strong but rebuttable assumption that such damage will be occasioned by excessively lengthy proceedings. It may however be minimal or even non-existent; domestic courts have to provide sufficient reasons to prove such to be the case.²¹⁰

166. The sufficiency of the remedy may depend on the level of compensation. The determination of non-pecuniary damage for excessive length of proceedings “must be done in a legally defined framework since reference has to be made to the amounts awarded, in similar cases, by the Strasbourg Court. Some divergence is permissible, within reason”.²¹¹

167. A compensation that is lower than the amount usually awarded for comparable delays by the Court itself may nevertheless be considered “adequate” in the light of the specific circumstances of the case, such as the standard of living in the State concerned, the promptness of the finding and award by the national court as well as the promptness of the payment within the national legal system.²¹² A lower level of compensation awarded by a State which has introduced a number of remedies, one of which is designed to expedite proceedings and one to afford compensation, is acceptable, provided that it is not unreasonable and that the relevant decisions are consonant with the legal tradition and the standard of living in the country concerned, are speedy, reasoned and executed very quickly.²¹³

168. The remedy must be available both for proceedings that have already ended and for those that are still pending.²¹⁴

VIII. The Venice Commission’s proposals concerning the effectiveness of domestic remedies in respect of excessive length of proceedings

A. As concerns the kind of remedy

169. The Venice Commission has previously expressed its view that, in general, in case of breach of one of the rights laid down in the European Convention on Human Rights, concrete reparation (restitutio in integrum) is preferable to the award of pecuniary compensation.²¹⁵

²⁰⁸ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 200.

²⁰⁹ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 201. The Court pointed out that in Poland applicants are reimbursed the court fee payable on lodging a complaint if their complaint is considered justified (see Charzyński v. Poland (dec.), no. 15212/03, to be published in ECHR 2005).

²¹⁰ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit., § 204.

²¹¹ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit. § 146; Ohlen v. Denmark judgment of 24 February 2005, §§ 30-31.

²¹² ECtHR, Bako v. Slovakia, decision of 15 March 2005.

²¹³ ECtHR, Scordino v. Italy judgment, cit. § 206; Dubjakova v. Slovakia, decision of 10 October 2004.

²¹⁴ ECtHR, Soc v. Croatia judgment of 9 August 2003, § 94; Paulino Tomas, dec. cit.; Mifsud v. France, cit., §

170. In the case of excessive length of proceedings, if the proceedings have ended or if they are still pending but a breach of the reasonable time requirement has occurred, reparation (pecuniary or non-pecuniary) is certainly acceptable, essential even, in relation to that breach.

171. However, the right to a trial within a reasonable time is, by its very nature, a continuous one, as much as its violation is; it develops with the development of the proceedings themselves: undue delays can occur at all times until the proceedings are over. New breaches of Article 6 of the Convention are therefore always possible as long as the proceedings are pending²¹⁶. The grant of pecuniary compensation for an undue delay which has already occurred does not exclude that another undue delay will occur. It thus does not close the issue of reparation, including preventive and acceleratory remedies.

172. Preventing and putting an end to undue delays is therefore of the utmost importance, and continues to be essential even after the past proceedings have already been excessively long. Speeding-up the proceedings is the only means of ensuring compliance with Article 6 ECHR in relation to the future conduct of that set of proceedings.

173. The Commission is thus of the view that each State-party to the European Convention on Human Rights should provide, in the first place, acceleratory remedies. In addition to – and not as an alternative to – these acceleratory remedies, States must provide compensatory remedies for breaches of the reasonable time requirement which may have already occurred.

174. If there exists an effective national remedy capable of speeding up the proceedings, no further question of reparation would arise after this remedy has been successfully used. If no such remedy exists, the procedure for an effective remedy granting pecuniary reparation for undue delays may have to be used after each undue delay. In a country with systemic problems, undue delays would be likely to continue to occur; the burden of a great number of pecuniary reparations might be assumed to constitute an incentive to introduce an effective acceleratory remedy, but that does not appear to be always the case .

175. CEPEJ states that “the mechanisms which are limited to compensation are too weak and do not adequately incite the States to modify their operational process and provide only one element a posteriori in the event of violation proven instead of trying to find a solution for the fundamental problem of excessive delays.”²¹⁷

176. The Committee of Ministers also shows a clear preference for acceleratory remedies.²¹⁸

177. The Court itself, while leaving the choice between compensatory and acceleratory remedies to the member States, expresses its preference for the latter and indeed seems to encourage States to adopt them, by granting certain “privileges”, for example by according that lower damages may be awarded by those States which have introduced “a number of remedies, one of which is designed to expedite proceedings and one to afford compensation”.

²¹⁵ See Venice Commission’s Opinion on the implementation of judgments of the European Court of Human Rights, CDL-AD(2002)034, § 64.

²¹⁶ See ECtHR, Apicella v. Italy [GC], 29 March 2006, § 113; Rotondi v. Italy, judgment of 27 April 2000, §§ 14-16, and S.A.GE.MA S.N.C. v. Italy, judgment of 27 April 2000, §§ 12-14. See also Tengerakis v. Cyprus, judgment of 9 November 2006, § 68.

²¹⁷ CEPEJ(2004)19rev2, A new objective for Judicial Systems: the processing of each case within an optimum and foreseeable timeframe, available at www.coe.int/cepej, p. 3.

²¹⁸ See M. Lobov, CDL(2006)035, p. 7.

178. The Venice Commission wishes in addition to underline the following: acceleratory remedies in the form of a request to take the procedural step to avoid unreasonable delay are to be seen as preventive, not compensatory. They do not amount to a restitutio in integrum. When an undue delay has taken place in a certain phase of the proceedings, the possibility of putting an end to such delay to avoid an unreasonably delayed trial as a whole does not represent a reparation in kind. The individual's entitlement not to suffer from an excessive delay derives from Article 6 § 1 as such, not from the finding of a breach of that provision.

179. If an undue delay has taken place in the proceedings as a whole, restitutio in integrum will be possible in the following forms:

- If the proceedings are still pending: (a) If the proceedings are criminal, by way of mitigation of the sentence or similar remedies (see para. 84 above). If the proceedings are civil, administrative or criminal, by way of fast-tracking the case to the extent possible. This means that the threshold of reasonableness in the remainder of the proceedings will be reduced, the case will be dealt with more quickly than an ordinary one: in this manner, the undue delay will be caught up (of course not arithmetically) and the global length of the proceedings will be "reasonable" within the meaning of Article 6 § 1. In this case, no pecuniary reparation will be necessary.
- If the proceedings are terminated, the only possibility will of course be pecuniary reparation.

180. The Venice Commission also underlines that the Strasbourg Court has stressed the importance of the subsidiarity principle: individuals should not be systematically forced to refer to the Court in Strasbourg complaints that could otherwise, and in the Court's opinion more appropriately, have been addressed in the first place within the national legal system.

181. The Commission notes that individuals who complain about the excessive length of still pending proceedings before the Strasbourg Court may obtain not only pecuniary reparation in application of Article 41 of the Convention, but also the acceleration of pending proceedings as a "natural" individual measure urged by the Committee of Ministers within the framework of the supervisory procedure. It follows that by going to Strasbourg, an individual may obtain, if applicable, both kinds of redress, compensatory and acceleratory.

182. In cases where the national legal system does not provide for acceleratory remedies (which is the case for most domestic legal systems), the individual is not afforded before his own authorities an equivalent redress to that which he may obtain in Strasbourg; there, the subsidiarity principle is deficient. Under these circumstances, the individual may argue not to have lost his status of victim even after obtaining (mere) pecuniary compensation in a domestic procedure and may challenge his need to exhaust the domestic remedy in question.

183. In conclusion, the Venice Commission considers that, in order to comply fully with the requirements of Article 13 of the Convention in relation to the reasonable time requirement laid down in Article 6 §1 of the Convention, Council of Europe member States should provide in the first place acceleratory remedies designed to prevent any (further) undue delays from taking place at any time until the proceedings are terminated.

184. In addition, they should provide compensatory remedies for any breach of the reasonable time requirement which may have already occurred in the proceedings (prior to the introduction of the effective acceleratory remedies).

B. As concerns whether or not the compensatory remedies for the excessive length of proceedings should be specific

185. The Venice Commission observes that, particularly in respect of compensatory pecuniary remedies, some States provide generic remedies, such as an action for damages against the State (see below, Table 2, annexed to the present study).

186. The possibility of such remedies in connection with excessive delays in the proceedings must be unequivocal, for example on the basis of established case-law. Otherwise, their effectiveness is questionable.

187. In doubtful cases, it would be appropriate that either the accessibility of the generic remedy for length complaints be duly clarified at the national level, or that a specific remedy be adopted.

C. As concerns the form of the remedies

188. The question of whether or not the remedy/ies for the excessive length of proceedings should be contained in specific legislation needs to be addressed at this stage.

189. The replies to the questionnaire show that not many States do have such legislation. Those States however which have been faced, or are expecting to be faced, with a significant number of applications before the Strasbourg Court on account of the excessive length of proceedings have introduced remedies for this problem through specific laws, which supplement or amend the relevant codes of procedure, or equivalent legislation.

190. Specific laws present the matter of reparation in a detailed manner, and therefore have the advantage of clarity and comprehensiveness. They (are deemed to) address the root cause of the length-of-proceedings problem, regulate in detail all matters, and contain the necessary explicit references to the case-law of the Strasbourg Court (notably as concerns pecuniary reparation). They may be more easily accessible to the public (and, in some cases, even to the courts) as well as to the instances of the Council of Europe.

191. Specific laws are not, however, indispensable and are not required in those countries which already dispose of effective remedies for excessive length, which are known by the authorities, the courts and the public.

D. As concerns the various remedies

1. Civil and administrative proceedings

a. In general

192. The acceleratory remedies concerning civil and administrative proceedings are: measures designed to put an end to the undue delay (such as requests to hold a hearing, obtain an expert's report, issue another necessary order or taking an act which the concerned authority had failed to take), disciplinary actions against the dilatory judge by means of a complaint to a supervisory authority (in the limited sense explained above), the possibility for a higher court to establish a time limit for the dilatory judge to deliver a solution or/and give instructions to the dilatory judge (this measures might be joined by the decision of the higher court to transfer the case to another judge).

193. The available compensatory remedies are: awarding compensation for the damages that occur as a result of lengthy proceedings (this remedy can either be the only one, or it can be coupled with the above-mentioned remedies that allow the speeding up of the proceedings in question), and the possibility of fast-tracking the case.

194. In civil proceedings, private parties often have different, even opposite interests, including as far as the length of these proceedings is concerned. The public interest however cannot be but a fair solution of the litigation, within a reasonable time frame (the fact that a party of a specific civil procedure has the interest of delaying the trial and acts to this purpose is generally considered, in many national legislations, as a procedural abuse, if certain limits are crossed).

195. Regarding administrative proceedings, it is clear that the public interest is both to ensure prompt and efficient decision making, and to enable individuals who apply to administrative authorities or to administrative courts to receive fair and equitable treatment. Further to the measures described above, the efficiency of the administrative proceedings could be improved by the preventive measure of providing the so-called positive silent procedure, within a prescribed time limit, for certain administrative acts (such as authorizations, licences etc) to be issued or renewed (if a public authority fails to take a decision in the prescribed time limit, it shall be deemed to have made a decision in favour of the applicant). However, the public interest involved as well as any interests of third parties will have to be given due consideration.

b. Acceleratory remedies

196. Providing acceleratory remedies is, in the Commission's opinion, the most effective manner of securing the right to a trial within a reasonable time and the right to an effective remedy for breaches of the said right. All States should therefore provide, in the first place, acceleratory remedies, and in particular for those cases in which the Strasbourg Court imposes a special diligence on the part of the authorities (see para. 31 above).

197. The Commission wishes to draw attention to the Checklist of indicators for the analysis of lengths of proceedings in the justice system, prepared by CEPEJ.²¹⁹

198. Indicator FIVE (Means to promptly diagnose delays and mitigate their consequences) reads, inter alia, as follows:

"While monitoring the duration of proceedings, the judicial system needs to have established mechanisms for prompt identification of excessive duration (delays) and should instantly alarm responsible persons and offices with a view to remedying the situation and preventing further dysfunctions.

Clear responsibility for prevention and suppression of delays

7. Can responsibility for the identification and avoidance of undue delays be clearly determined ?

a. Is there a person or office that is in charge of monitoring the regular course of particular proceedings and locating delays with a view to reducing them, irrespective of the stage of the proceedings (first instance, appeal)?

b. Does a responsible person or office have a duty to report to the court, authority or office undue delays? Can the responsible person take steps to resolve current delays or prevent future ones and speed up the proceedings ? Are appropriate measures available against the responsible person if steps are not undertaken or results achieved?

²¹⁹http://www.coe.int/t/e/legal_affairs/legal_cooperation/operation_of_justice/efficiency_of_justice/documents/12%202005%20REV%20CEPEJ%20check%20indicators%20list%20E%20.pdf.

c. Is there an office being responsible for appropriate length of judicial proceedings at the national level? Has it authority to take action where delays have been observed? (...)

199. In the Commission's view, it would be highly appropriate not only to provide for the monitoring structure suggested by CEPEJ, but also to regard it as a means of preventing undue delays within the meaning of Articles 35 and 13 of the Convention.

200. The powers, scope of action and right of initiative of the monitoring body should be coordinated with the relevant domestic rules on the already existing measures for accelerating the proceedings.

201. A duty should be imposed on the monitoring person or office to monitor and promptly intervene ex officio.

202. In addition, the possibility to seek the intervention of such monitoring authority should be given to parties to proceedings through their lawyer. The consequence of the failure by a party, through its own fault, to have recourse to it should entail the forfeiture of the right to reparation for the undue delay that may have occurred as a consequence of such failure.

203. As regards the concrete application of acceleratory remedies, it obviously impacts on the management of the courts and the conduct of the proceedings, a domain which falls outside the competence of the Venice Commission and instead should be looked into by CEPEJ. In this respect, the Venice Commission notes that in many States, when a procedure has already exceeded a reasonable time, the superior court may impart deadlines to the dilatory court for the termination of the procedure. The Venice Commission wishes to underline the importance of linking such deadlines to the effective management of the court : otherwise, this peremptory deadlines might affect the order of treatment of cases which may be more urgent in absolute terms. For this reason, the Venice Commission considers that the possibility of imparting deadlines should be left to national courts with a direct knowledge of the situation of the dilatory court and should even be exercised in coordination with the authority that is in charge of the court management.

c. Compensatory remedies

204. As concerns reparation of damages, the replies to the questionnaire show that the grounds for obtaining damages vary from the heavy workload of the courts, the malfunctioning or the denial of justice, the fault of a judge or of another authority, or a violation of the right to a hearing within a reasonable time.

205. The Venice Commission, in the light of the case-law of the Strasbourg Court, considers that it would be appropriate to award damages on the objective ground of the "unreasonable" length of the procedure, without referring to personal fault or malfunctioning and without taking into consideration practical circumstances such as a heavy workload, changes in personnel etcetera. It is of evidence that in appreciating the excessive character of the length the three criteria established by the ECtHR are to be taking into consideration, namely the complexity of the case, the behaviour of the applicant and the conduct of the authorities, including the court. A subsequent regress action could be introduced, if the fault of an authority is under question. But for the scope of the remedy, it should be based on the objective responsibility of the State.

206. It is very important that the amount of pecuniary compensation for the victim be adequate and sufficient, be awarded in conformity with the European Court of Human Rights' case-law on the matter and by taking into account the specific circumstances (the standard of living) in the respective State, and not be left to the total discretion of a jurisdiction. Otherwise, an inaccurate amount of the damages would not have the significance of a true reparation of the violation.

207. In this respect, the Venice Commission considers that the most appropriate solution would be that the criteria for granting pecuniary reparation of moral damage, as well as the general criteria for the award of pecuniary reparation of material damage, should be spelled out clearly and in as great detail as possible at the national level.

208. At least with reference to the countries which face “systemic” length-of-proceedings problems, these criteria should be submitted to the Committee of Ministers through the Department of Execution of Judgments of the Directorate General II in order for their compatibility with the Council of Europe’s requirements to be assessed (ideally with a participation of the European Court of Human Rights) prior to their enactment.

209. As concerns the features of the remedial procedures, it is essential for any compensatory remedy in respect of excessive length of proceedings to be conducted in the swiftest possible manner. Compensatory procedures should follow simplified rules, possibly not be subject to three levels of jurisdiction, and be governed by strict time-limits.

210. Normally, the quantification of the damage, at least the moral one, should be made by the same authority which rules on the existence of a violation of Article 6 § 1 by reference to the criteria developed by the Strasbourg Court. In case of a complex determination of pecuniary damage, it should instead be possible to refer the decision to more competent bodies: but the duration of the relevant procedure should be carefully monitored (it might even be appropriate to prioritise this kind of cases). It might be appropriate to allow for the choice, to be made by the individual, between ordinary proceedings of determination of pecuniary damage, possibly with three levels of jurisdiction, and an abridged, simplified but clearly fast-tracked procedure, with only a limited possibility of appeal.

211. The decisions awarding damages should be immediately enforceable, and provision should be made for their enforcement within a maximum of six months (which entails adequate budgetary provisions).

212. Legal costs in the remedial proceeding should be kept to a minimum, and indeed be charged on the State, at least when the application is successful. No fixed expenses should be imposed in this kind of procedures.

213. Exemption from legal costs could indeed be seen as a compensatory remedy (which is done in certain member States, such as Denmark), which would present the advantage of providing the applicant with a tangible, prompt, often significant form of pecuniary measure which would not necessitate to issue proceedings. The matter of what State budget would be affected by this exemption will of course deserve consideration at the national level.

214. As regards disciplinary proceedings, only to a certain extent may they be considered an actual “remedy” as regards undue delays, unless the disciplinary action may be initiated pending proceedings and lead to instructions to or “removal” of the dilatory judge. On the whole, this measure may become closer to a preventive remedy as to the future behaviour of the judge concerned and with a more general, educational effect.. As the Court has pointed out, this measure may only be regarded as effective if it has a direct impact on the proceedings at issue (see para. 147 above).

215. Disciplinary measures during pending proceedings could however, on the other hand, raise the issue of judicial independence as well as the danger of abuse by parties in the proceedings and by the judicial hierarchy.

216. In any case, this compensatory remedy of disciplinary measures or instructions should not be limited to judges only, as the cause of delay may reside in any other professional that participate in criminal (or other) proceedings. It should be made sure that responsibility can reach all of them (ie. prosecutors, police, clerks, experts, etc).

217. In civil proceedings, the remedies for excessive length should be adapted in consequence. For example, if the length of proceedings is due to the dilatory manoeuvres of one party (left unsanctioned by the judge), the other party(ies) should be entitled to ask for the measures described above. And if the length of proceedings is due to the lack of diligence from the part of the applicant, the domestic legislation should provide the possibility for the judge to suspend the procedure and even pronounce it obsolete. This is, beside a sanction for the lack of diligence, also a method for assuring that a procedure once started will not continue sine die.

2. Criminal proceedings

a. In general

218. The replies to the questionnaire indicate that, with few exceptions, almost all existing remedies are compensatory (after the breach of reasonable time has happened).

219. The Commission recalls that procedural delays acquire special relevance in criminal proceedings, because these proceedings affect basic individual rights (together with the right to a fair trial, other guarantees linked to the right to defence and to personal freedom can be violated). Compensatory remedies, capable of operating only a posteriori, do not appear fully satisfactory, and preventive remedies should be developed.

220. This can only be achieved if member States systematically collect information about their systems so that they can identify where delays occur and how efficient the existing remedies are as to their prevention or redress. At the same time the lawyer of the defendant should be vigilant from the very beginning to challenge unnecessary delays, and should be given the possibilities to effectively do so and to react adequately.

b. Acceleratory remedies

221. Very few countries appear to have remedies that allow to speed up proceedings before an unreasonable delay actually occurs. In countries which have acceleratory systems that are applicable to both civil and criminal proceedings it would have to be clarified whether the investigative phase of the criminal procedure is also covered. In other words, accelerating criminal proceedings must imply the possibility of accelerating not only the hearing or trial itself but also the investigative or pre-trial phase. Undue delays may happen in both. Procedural law must allow to obtain a remedy from the authority (ie. judge or prosecutor) that is actually dealing with the proceedings, as criminal proceedings sometimes go through different stages and different authorities.

222. For example, the interlocutory system described by Portugal (see paras. .. above) seems very effective: it can be addressed both to the prosecutors and to the judges depending on where the case is pending. It sets up a simple procedure, with time-limits to decide and the explicit possibility of adopting acceleratory measures. It can be initiated by any party in the proceedings and from the moment a legal time-limit has been exceeded. In fact, this last characteristic is not an element of the reasonable time requirement; it would suffice for a similar mechanism to be efficient if it could allow to raise the alarm about a stalling in the proceedings that could become unjustifiable and to take measures therein. It appears important that legitimacy to lodge such complaints would be as wide as possible and not only reduced to the defendant, but also to the public or private prosecutor, as the case may be, and any civil parties, who also have a legitimate interest.

223. In this sense it could also be appropriate to give public prosecutors the possibility or the obligation to be kept informed of pending proceedings and the powers to either request the investigative judge to close proceedings if the prosecutor has sufficient elements to bring charges, or take acceleratory measures, and inversely the same could be applied to judges when the case is in the hands of the prosecutors (for example an order to decide on bringing charges), so that both institutions could in a sense act as watchdogs on the length of proceedings. It could be useful to provide certain time-limits after which an obligation to inform of the progress of the proceedings could arise. It could also be useful if the possibility to adopt management measures related to the handling of the case was specifically provided.

224. Finally, almost no information has been provided on remedies to accelerate proceedings as regards the trial phase. These could include the possibility to ask for the conclusion of the investigative phase and/or the setting of a date for the hearing, and powers to speed up this scheduling in specific cases (dangers of undue delay considering the time it took to close investigations, defendant held in custody, etc). Once again the question of expediting proceedings depends on all the participants in the proceedings and therefore, to the appropriate extent, remedies should be applicable to all. For example in the phase of the hearing, the possibilities should be investigated to introduce measures such as the power of the judge to take coercive or preventive measures such as setting time-limits for experts to provide their input, to decide on fines or disciplinary sanctions if lawyers, experts or witnesses do not appear before the court when so requested; to suspend the hearing only in exceptional cases, etc.

c. Compensatory remedies specific to criminal proceedings

225. As regards the possibility to adopt the decision of discontinuing the case before it is brought before the court, this solution has the obvious advantage of anticipating the effects without the need of going through the trial and waiting for a decision on the merits of the case.

226. However, due to the seriousness (substantive character) of the effects and in view of the public and other interests which are at stake in criminal proceedings, it can also be argued that such a decision should be taken cautiously, after a proper hearing and by means of a motivated decision on the merits.

227. A balanced approach could be to welcome, on the one hand, that countries provide for a remedy that can anticipate these effects to the "pre-trial" phase of the proceedings but at the same time considering (as it happens now) that it should be reserved only for very exceptional cases. Moreover, "anticipating" the procedure might pose a problem of legal basis in countries that follow the legality principle (mandatory prosecution) in which a specific legal basis would have to be provided to allow for the discontinuance of proceedings before the final ruling.

228. In itself, the principle of taking into account the delays in the assessment of the punishment must be considered to be an appropriate form of redress in criminal proceedings, in particular as regards the mitigation of the sentence and a mere declaration of guilt.

229. It is true that these forms of redress may contradict other exigencies of justice and notably they may cause a lack of "substantive justice", when a delay in the justice system makes it impossible to punish the offender or to punish him at the level that is common for the crime concerned, or they may lead to an outcome of criminal proceedings on the basis of procedural reasons, and not on the basis of the gravity of the alleged crime. On the other hand, they may be seen as the consequence of the fundamental guarantee of a trial within a reasonable time.

230. Even though the purposes of criminal law and the ultimate aim of the punishment are retribution and justice from the point of view of society, (re-)education and atonement on the part of the perpetrator, and satisfaction for the victim(s), the perspectives of a meaningful fulfilment of each of these purposes and aims after a considerable lapse of time have to be weighted against the public interest of a fair and speedy trial and the interest of the person concerned not to be subjected to a long period of uncertainty about the outcome of the prosecution instituted against him alone and not a mere application of the private justice principle “eye for an eye”. Consequently, taking into consideration serious delays in the trial in the assessment of the punishment would appear accurate as the social scope of the punishment can no longer be achieved and the society is no longer interested in punishing a crime committed a long time ago. Only the retributive scope of the punishment can still be reached by continuing the criminal procedure.

231. As regards more specifically the acquittal and the discontinuance of proceedings, they present other problems and once again raise the need to set up real preventive methods that avoid these extreme solutions. They should in any case be applied in exceptional cases as they may raise issues in connection with the possibility of declaring civil responsibility “ex-delicto” (in countries that have this system) to which Belgium seems to refer. This might imply in the best of cases that the victim would not be able to get compensation at least in the criminal proceeding and would have to initiate an independent civil proceeding. In the worse of cases, this could even imply that the victim will not get any compensation at all because the offender has been found “not guilty” or the existence of the crime has not been determined as there has not been a decision on the merits.

232. The motivation used by the judge when assessing the punishment against the length of the proceedings is of great importance. The decision must indicate if and to what extent the defence rights or the establishment of the truth were affected by the length of the proceedings. The link between the assessment of the punishment and the breach of the reasonable time requirement must equally be made explicit. It would also seem appropriate to indicate what sentence would have been applied in the absence of “compensation” due to the excessive length.

d. General compensatory remedies also applicable to criminal proceedings

233. As regards reparation of damages (pecuniary or non-pecuniary) that occur as a result of lengthy proceedings, it may constitute some, although indirect, motivation for the reasonable time requirement to be observed in criminal cases. The effectiveness of this remedy also depends on whose budget it is charged.

234. In some countries, reparation of damages appears to be only possible in case of discontinuance or acquittal, and it seems that courts are usually reluctant to provide it cumulatively, even when that is formally possible (see UK). This could be unfair for it is also possible that a defendant who would have been acquitted in any case, in addition suffers from delayed proceedings to have his case solved. The procedural situation of a defendant in criminal proceedings pending a decision on his case is especially “sensitive” and might have for example repercussions in social/professional life. In case of undue delays it seems important that compensatory remedies include pecuniary redress of these possible consequences. Another general suggestion is to simplify the procedure to lodge and decide upon these claims as they derive from the previous acknowledgement of undue delay.

235. The possibility of introducing a claim for damages pending the allegedly lengthy proceedings may raise concerns as to the effect of the pressure exercised in this way upon the prosecutor or judge, thus possibly leading to rendering decisions too quickly and, as a consequence, to a superficial solution of the case.

IX. MAIN CONCLUSIONS

236. The Venice Commission is of the opinion that the right to a trial within a reasonable time, guaranteed by Article 6 § 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights, must be secured as such by Council of Europe member States, and cannot be systematically replaced by the payment of pecuniary compensation.

237. While the payment of pecuniary compensation must be granted in cases where undue delays have occurred pending the possibly necessary reforms and improvements of the judicial systems and practices, it should not be regarded or accepted as a form of fulfilment of the obligations stemming from Article 6 and from Article 13 of the Convention.

238. The Venice Commission considers therefore that Council of Europe member States should provide in the first place adequate procedural means of ensuring that cases are processed by courts in a foreseeable and optimum manner. These procedural means respond in the first place to the obligation of securing the reasonable time requirement. To the extent that they can be used also in cases when a delay has occurred, they can also be seen as acceleratory remedies. However, the possibility of obtaining that the delayed procedural step be taken upon application to a higher body, for example, should not be seen as restitutio in integrum, their effect being merely to obtain one's right under Article 6 § 1 of the Convention, and not a reparation under Article 13.

239. States should provide in addition compensatory remedies for any breach of the reasonable time requirement which may have already occurred in the proceedings (prior to the introduction of the effective acceleratory remedies).

240. In criminal cases, there exist specific forms of compensatory remedies which are to be considered as forms of restitutio in integrum: the discontinuance of the prosecution, the mitigation or reduction of the sentence; an acquittal; the low-fixing of a fine; the non deprivation of civil and political rights. They may cause however, in some cases, a lack of substantive justice. Acquittal and discontinuance of the proceedings should be only applied in exceptional cases. In the motivation used by the judge when assessing the length of the proceedings, the link between the latter and the assessment of the punishment should be made explicit, and it would seem appropriate to indicate what sentence would have been imposed if the duration had been reasonable.

241. In civil and administrative proceedings (and also, residually, in criminal ones) the ideal compensatory remedy would seem to be the fast tracking of the - until then delayed - procedure. If the case is dealt with faster than the ordinary ones, the previous undue delay will be caught up, and the global length of the proceedings will be "reasonable". No need for pecuniary reparation will exist in such a case. In criminal cases, it should be possible to accelerate the investigative or pre-trial phase too.

242. Pecuniary reparation should be granted in cases when the delays are irreparable, that is when the proceedings are over.

243. Pending possibly necessary national reforms, pecuniary compensation will remain essential for breaches which have already occurred.

244. In order not only to monitor, but also to intervene in the proceedings when they are being unduly delayed, the structure suggested by CEPEJ in Indicator FIVE of its checklist of indicators for the analysis of length of proceedings in the justice system should be set up and also used and regarded as a remedy within the meaning of Articles 13 and 35 of the Convention.

245. Pecuniary compensation should be awarded in an amount compatible with the case-law of the European Court. The criteria for awarding moral damage and the general criteria for calculating material damage should be set out clearly and in detail, preferably in the law itself. In respect of countries which face systemic problems of length of proceedings, these criteria should be previously assessed by the Committee of Ministers, ideally with the participation of the European Court.

246. The remedial proceedings should be conducted as swiftly as possible, and possibly with fewer levels of jurisdiction. Complex determination of material damage should either follow the ordinary way, or be carried out by the authority competent to assess the reasonableness of the proceedings through a simplified but clearly fast-tracked procedure, the choice between the two being left to the applicant.

247. The adoption by Council of Europe member States of specific laws on length-of-proceedings remedies does not appear indispensable and is not required in those countries which already dispose of effective remedies for excessive length, which are known by the authorities, the courts and the public. However, the Venice Commission underlines that specific laws present the matter of reparation in an abstract and general manner, and therefore have the advantage of clarity and comprehensiveness. They may be thus more easily accessible to the public (and, in some cases, even to the courts) as well as to the instances of the Council of Europe.

248. The Venice Commission stands ready to assist any country which should wish to proceed with the elaboration of a specific piece of legislation setting out or improving the national remedies in respect of excessive length of proceedings, as well as the Committee of Ministers and the Directorate General II in their assessment of the general measures taken by States pursuant to Article 46 of the Convention.

TABLE 1²²⁰

THE COUNCIL OF EUROPE'S MEMBER STATES	AN ACCELERATORY REMEDY	A DISCIPLINARY ACTION AGAINST THE DILATORY AUTHORITY	A COMPENSATORY REMEDY ²²¹	TYPES OF DAMAGES AWARDED
ALBANIA
ANDORRA	√
ARMENIA
AUSTRIA	√		√	Material and non-material damage
AZERBAIJAN
BELGIUM	√		√	Material and non-material damage
BOSNIA & HERZEGOVINA	√	√	√	Non-material damage
BULGARIA	√	√
CROATIA	√		√	non-material damage
CYPRUS	√		√
CZECH REPUBLIC	√		√	Material damage
DENMARK	√		√	Material and non-material damage
ESTONIA	√		√
FINLAND		√
FRANCE			√	Material and non-material damage
GEORGIA		√
GERMANY	√		√
GREECE
HUNGARY			√	Material and non-

²²⁰ The remedies given in the present table can either be used for one particular type of proceedings (for example only for administrative proceedings in Estonia) or for all of them.

²²¹ Including compensation in kind (for example mitigation of sentence) or pecuniary compensation.

				material damage
ICELAND
IRELAND	√		√	Material and non-material damage
ITALY		√	√	Material and non-material damage
LATVIA
LIECHTENSTEIN	√		√
LITHUANIA	√	√	√	Material and non-material damage
LUXEMBOURG			√
MALTA			√	Material and non-material damage
MONACO
MOLDOVA
NETHERLANDS	√		√	Material and non-material damage
NORWAY			√
POLAND	√		√	Material and non-material damage
PORTUGAL	√	√	√	Material and non-material damage
ROMANIA
RUSSIAN FEDERATION		√	√	Material and non-material damage
SAN MARINO
SERBIA AND MONTENEGRO	√	√	√	Material and non-material damage
SLOVAKIA	√	√	√	Non-material damage
SLOVENIA	√		√	Material and non-material

				damage
SPAIN	√		√	Material and non-material damage
SWEDEN		√	√	Material damage
SWITZERLAND			√	Material damage
“THE FORMER YUGOSLAV REPUBLIC OF MACEDONIA “		√
TURKEY
UKRAINE		√
UNITED KINGDOM			√	Material and non-material damage

TABLE 2

THE COUNCIL OF EUROPE'S MEMBER STATES	A SPECIFIC REMEDY¹	A GENERIC REMEDY²
ALBANIA		An application to the Constitutional Court complaining of a breach of the right to a fair trial.
ANDORRA	A party can address to the Superior Council of Justice in case of the delay in proceedings and request taking of necessary measures. The Superior Council of Justice can ask the judges and magistrates to speed up the proceedings in question.	A constitutional complaint (amparo) before the Constitutional Tribunal.
ARMENIA
AUSTRIA	Section 91 of the Courts Act If a court is dilatory in taking any procedural step, such as announcing or holding a hearing, obtaining an expert's report, or preparing a decision, any party may submit a request to this court for the superior court to impose an appropriate time-limit for the taking of the particular procedural step. Subject to any contrary provision in the administrative regulations, the authorities must give a decision on applications by parties ... and appeals without unnecessary delay, and at the latest six months after the application or appeal has been lodged. Section 73 of the General Administrative Procedure Act If the decision is not served on the party within this time-limit, jurisdiction will be transferred to the competent superior authority upon the party's written request (Devolutionsantrag). This request has to be refused by the competent superior authority if the delay was not caused by preponderant fault of the authority As far as the administrative criminal	The parties concerned are free to address the Constitutional Court after the domestic remedies have been exhausted. The Constitutional Court must then examine whether the authority has complied with its duty arising from Article 6 § 1 of the Convention.

¹ A specific action related to the breach of the reasonable time requirement (for example: a request to accelerate the proceedings in question, an action against a State for damage caused by non-compliance with the obligation to give a decision without delay, an action aimed at mitigation of sentence in criminal proceedings).

² A general action (for example: an action for breach of a constitutional/conventional right, a civil action for tort against the State).

	proceedings are concerned, there is no opportunity to expedite the proceedings, but regard must be had in determining the sentence, on whether the duration of the proceedings in issue can be regarded as reasonable in the light of the specific circumstances of the case. A complaint against the excessive length of proceedings can be lodged by a party in the proceedings.
AZERBAIJAN
BELGIUM	Une sanction est prévue par l'article 21ter du Titre préliminaire du Code de procédure pénale lorsque le juge du fond constate un dépassement du délai raisonnable. La sanction du dépassement du délai raisonnable prend la forme d'une simple déclaration de culpabilité ou du prononcé d'une peine inférieure à la peine minimale prévue par la loi; Si l'affaire est à l'instruction l'article 136 du Code d'instruction criminelle prévoit que lorsque l'instruction n'est pas clôturée après une année, l'inculpé ou la partie civile peut saisir la chambre des mises en accusation (c'est-à-dire la juridiction d'instruction d'appel, qui a un très large pouvoir de contrôle de l'instruction) par simple requête; la chambre des mises en accusation peut alors demander des rapports sur l'état d'avancement des affaires et prendre connaissance des dossiers; elle peut enjoindre au juge d'instruction d'accélérer la procédure, voire lui fixer un délai de clôture de son instruction; elle peut aussi déléguer un de ses membres pour poursuivre l'instruction en lieu et place du juge d'instruction. l'article 136bis du Code d'instruction criminelle, dans le même souci de contenir les instructions dans des délais raisonnables, fait obligation au procureur du Roi de faire rapport au procureur général de toutes les affaires dont l'instruction n'est pas clôturée dans l'année du premier réquisitoire (c'est-à-dire de la saisine du juge d'instruction). S'il l'estime nécessaire pour le bon déroulement de l'instruction, et donc pour l'accélération de la procédure, par exemple, procureur général peut saisir la	La violation du délai raisonnable engage la responsabilité de l'Etat; cette responsabilité est déduite de la méconnaissance de l'article 6 de la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme et du droit subjectif que ce texte consacre au profit du justiciable; cette méconnaissance constitue, dans l'ordre interne, une faute au sens de l'article 1382 du Code civil obligeant l'Etat à réparer le préjudice qui en est résulté.

	chambre des mises en accusation qui, après avoir éventuellement entendu le rapport du juge d'instruction, a alors les mêmes pouvoirs que dans le cadre de l'article 136 évoqué ci-dessus. Pour ce qui concerne encore une affaire faisant l'objet d'une instruction, il faut relever que la chambre du conseil - juridiction d'instruction de première instance- lorsqu'elle est appelée à décider du sort d'une instruction clôturée par le juge d'instruction, peut, dès ce stade, constater le dépassement du délai raisonnable et ordonner le non-lieu ou déclarer les poursuites irrecevables. La chambre des mises en accusation peut mettre fin aux poursuites à tout moment pour le même motif, fût-elle saisie d'un problème de procédure en cours d'instruction.
BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA	With regard to administrative proceedings, parties may appeal to a second instance body if the first instance body hasn't taken a decision within the time-limit prescribed by the Law. The second instance body will request a written explanation from the first instance body and may, if a decision was not taken due to legitimate reasons, determine a deadline for the first instance body to take a decision. In case the reasons for delay are not justified, the second instance body will take the final decision. If the second instance body fails to take a decision on the party's appeal within a fixed period, the party may raise an administrative dispute.	A complaint on the basis of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention can be lodged before the Constitutional Court. It could, where the proceedings have not ended yet, order that the competent court complete the proceedings by certain date or without further delay (normally within six months), and it could order a monetary compensation for non-pecuniary damage. If a delay occurred due to a misconduct of a judge, he/she could be subjected to a disciplinary procedure.
BULGARIA	Article 217a of the Code of Civil Procedure, introduced in 1999, provides that: "1. Each party may lodge a complaint about delays at every stage of the case, including after oral argument, when the examination of the case, the delivery of judgement or the transmitting of an appeal against a judgment is unduly delayed. 2. The complaint about delays shall be lodged directly with the higher court, no copies shall be served on the other party, and no State fee shall be due. The lodging of a complaint about delays shall not be limited by time

	3. The chairperson of the court with which the complaint has been lodged shall request the case file and shall immediately examine the complaint in private. His instructions as to the acts to be performed by the court shall be mandatory. His order shall not be subject to appeal and shall be sent immediately together with the case file to the court against which the complaint has been filed. 4. In case he determines that there has been [undue delay], the chairperson of the higher court may make a proposal to the disciplinary panel of the Supreme Judicial Council for the taking of disciplinary action.” There also exists the possibility to expedite the criminal proceedings through a complaint to various levels of the prosecution authorities.
--	---	--

CROATIA	Section 63 of the 2002 Constitutional Act on the Constitutional Court provides that : “(1) The Constitutional Court shall examine a constitutional complaint even before all legal remedies have been exhausted in cases when a competent court has not decided within a reasonable time a claim concerning the applicant’s rights and obligations or a criminal charge against him ... (2) If the constitutional complaint ... under paragraph 1 of this Section is accepted, the Constitutional Court shall determine a time-limit within which a competent court shall decide the case on the merits... (3) In a decision under paragraph 2 of this Article, the Constitutional Court shall fix appropriate compensation for the applicant in respect of the violation found concerning his constitutional rights ... The compensation shall be paid from the State budget within a term of three months from the date when the party lodged a request for its payment”. After 29 December 2005 the Constitutional Court retained its jurisdiction stipulated in Article 63 of the 2002 Constitutional Act in a manner that it decides, in the first and last instance, on the reasonable length of proceedings before the Supreme Court, where the constitutional complaint may be lodged as long as proceeding is pending, i.e. until the Supreme Court decision is served on the party. In all other cases the Constitutional Court has become the court of last instance concerning the protection of the right to a trial within reasonable time, so the constitutional complaint may be lodged within 30 days from the day when the second instance decision of the Supreme Court is served on the party. (In this decision the Supreme Court adjudicated on the appeal of the party against the first instance judgment of a lower court delivered in accordance with Articles 27 and 28 of the 2005 Courts Act.)
---------	---	--

--	--	--

	The 2005 Courts Act prescribed a new legal remedy for the protection against the excessive length of judicial proceedings. It is a request for the protection of the right to a trial within a reasonable time. This request is decided on by the higher instance court of law in respect of a lower instance court before which proceedings are pending. The Constitutional Court decides on the length of proceedings before the Supreme Court (the highest court of law in Croatia) in both the first and last instance. Article 27 "(1) A party in a judicial proceedings that deems that the competent court did not adjudicate within a reasonable time on his/her rights, obligations, suspicion or indictment, may directly file a request to a higher court with aim of protecting his/her right to a trial within a reasonable time. (2) If the request pertains to a pending proceedings before the High Commercial Court of the Republic of Croatia, the High Tort Court of the Republic of Croatia or the Administrative Court of the Republic of Croatia, the Supreme Court of the Republic of Croatia will adjudicate on the matter. (3) The adjudication procedure pertaining to the request stated in Paragraph 1 of the Article hereof is of urgent nature." Article 28 "(1) If the court referred to in Article 27 of the Law hereof finds the request of the applicant well-founded, it will establish a deadline within which the court before which the proceedings is pending has to decide on the right or the obligations, or the suspicion or the indictment of the applicant. It also has to determine the appropriate compensation to which the applicant is entitled since his/her right to a trial within a reasonable time has been infringed. (2) The compensation will be remunerated from the State Budget within 3 months of the day the party filed its request for compensation. (3) An appeal against the decision of a request for the protection of the right to a trial within a reasonable time may be filed to the Supreme Court of the Republic of Croatia within 15 days. The adjudication of
--	---	--

	the Supreme Court of the Republic of Croatia cannot be contested, however, a constitutional lawsuit can be filed." A request may be submitted by a party in a judicial proceeding that deems that the competent court of law did not adjudicate within a reasonable time on his/her rights and obligations or suspicion or indictment. A request may be filed as long as proceedings are pending, i.e. until the decision on its completion is served on the party. The procedure is a special one and it is of urgent nature.
CYPRUS	In criminal cases, the accused may raise the issue that his constitutional right for a trial within a reasonable time has been violated and that he should be acquitted. If a judgement has been reserved for more than 6 months then an interested party can apply to the Supreme Court seeking a remedy. The Supreme Court in examining such an application can: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - order the retrial of the case by a different court - make an order for the issue of Judgement within a time limit - issue any other necessary order.
THE CZECH REPUBLIC	Section 5 § 1 of the Law no. 335/1991 on courts and judges provides that : "judges are required to rule impartially and fairly and without delay". By virtue of Section 6 § 1 it is possible to lodge complaints with the organs of the judicial system (such as presidents of courts, or the Ministry of Justice) concerning the way courts have conducted judicial proceedings, whether these concern delays, inappropriate behaviour on the part of persons invested with judicial functions or interference with the proper conduct of court proceedings. Law No. 192/2003 introduced a new Article 174a to the Law No. 6/2002 on tribunals and judges (in force since 01/07/2004) according to which a party who considers that proceedings have lasted too long may ask for a deadline for taking a procedural action. Law no. 82/1998 on State liability for damage caused in the exercise of public authority by an irregularity in a decision or the conduct of proceedings (in force since 15 May 1998) in its Section	Law no. 182/1993 on the Constitutional Court Section 82(3) provides that when the Constitutional Court upholds a constitutional appeal it must either set aside the impugned decision by a public authority or, where the infringement of a right guaranteed by the Constitution is the result of an interference other than a decision, forbid the authority concerned to continue to infringe the right and order it to re-establish the status quo if that is possible.

	13 provides that the State is liable for damage caused by an irregularity in the conduct of proceedings, including non-compliance with the obligation to perform an act or give a decision within the statutory time-limit. The draft law modifying the Law No. 82/1998 has been submitted to the Parliament. The draft law provides for an adequate compensation (including the one for non-pecuniary damage) for the applicants suffering from undue delays during the proceedings. The draft law will be applied retroactively: if the applicant has his length of proceedings case pending before the European Court, he has the possibility of asking for compensation within one year from the entry into force of the draft law.
DENMARK	In civil as well as criminal cases, it is the court dealing with the concrete case that decides on a complaint concerning the length of proceedings. If a violation of ECHR article 6 is found, the result may for instance be compensation, reduction of the sentence or the exemption from paying legal costs that the person in question should otherwise have paid. In pending court proceedings, any party to the case may – at any point during the proceedings, ask the court dealing with the case to schedule the case for trial. In criminal cases, where the case has not yet been brought before the courts, the person in question may lodge a complaint with the Regional Prosecutor. The Regional Public Prosecutors generally supervise the work of the Chief Constables and may – on the basis of a complaint or otherwise – give instructions to the Chief Constables, including instructions concerning the handling of a specific case.	The compensation claim is considered under section 1018h of the Administration of Justice Act which in practice also covers compensation on the basis of the length of proceedings.
ESTONIA	Delays by the administrative authorities in administrative proceedings may be appealed to the courts, whereas the court is able to order specific performance and, if damage has been caused due to the delay, damages to the person.
FINLAND	It is possible to submit a complaint either to the Ombudsman or to the Chancellor of Justice. These authorities can raise a criminal or disciplinary case against those they deem responsible for the delay.

	The mitigation of sentence is possible.
FRANCE	New provisions dating to 2005 modifying the procedural part of the Code of Administrative Justice determine new modalities for deciding on the applications with respect to the length of administrative proceedings. The Conseil d'Etat is competent to decide on the above-mentioned matters in the first and last resort. Applications are therefore dealt with promptly thus avoiding a new litigation with respect to the length of proceedings within the authority responsible for dealing with the complaint. Moreover a draft decree examined by the Conseil d'Etat on 7 December 2005 completed the above provision. A preventive remedy was introduced in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe. It was decided to confer particular responsibilities to the permanent Mission of inspection of administrative jurisdictions. Any party of allegedly lengthy proceedings should be able to address to the chief of the inspection Mission. If appropriate, the latter will draw the attention of the chief of the jurisdiction in question to the issue. At the same time he will receive administrative or judicial decisions on compensation for the damage suffered due to the excessive length of administrative proceedings. He could therefore, if considers appropriate, point out to the heads of jurisdictions the cases involving malfunctioning of the public service.	Article L. 781-1 of the Code of Judicial Organisation: "The State shall be under an obligation to compensate for damage caused by a malfunctioning of the system of justice. This liability shall be incurred only in respect of gross negligence or a denial of justice".
GEORGIA	The law of Georgia "On disciplinary proceedings and disciplinary liability of judges of the courts of general jurisdiction of Georgia" provides for the liability of a judge. In particular one ground for liability of a judge is "unreasonable delay of consideration of a case...".
GERMANY	At present German law does not provide for a specific remedy in respect of excessive length of proceedings. However, the jurisprudence of the civil courts has developed – although the practice differs in diverse court regions – an extraordinary remedy in cases of unreasonable delays. In general, such a remedy is granted if a decision is delayed for an unreasonably long time and if this may objectively be viewed as a denial of justice. In such a case, the appeal court will issue an order to the original court to proceed with the case. It may even indicate specific measures to be taken.	Article 93 The Federal Constitutional Court, jurisdiction: The Federal Constitutional Court shall rule: 4a. on constitutional complaints which may be filed by anybody claiming that one of their basic rights or one of their rights under paragraph (4) of Article 20 or under Article 33, 38, 101, 103 or 104 has been violated by public authority;

	In criminal cases, the jurisprudence of the Federal Court clearly states that whenever the proceedings have been unduly delayed so as to constitute a breach of Art. 6 ECHR, the court has to mention this explicitly in its judgment and to compensate by reducing the sentence. Undue delay may even lead to the proceedings being terminated, if the violation can not be compensated otherwise. In addition to this, the Federal Government is contemplating the passing of a law introducing a specific remedy against excessive length of proceedings in all branches of the law. The draft has been circulated among Länder ministries and professional bodies. Responses to the draft are now coming in. In the light of these reactions the government will decide whether and how to proceed with the project.
GREECE
HUNGARY	The Hungarian Parliament has recently passed a bill on the introduction of a preventive remedy based on the Austrian model (Holzinger). Upon a complaint by a party to the case, in case of refusal by the proceeding judge to act upon it, the court of higher instance would have the power to set a deadline to the proceeding court for taking specific measures or for concluding the case (S. 114/A and 114/B, in force since 1 April 2006). In criminal cases, the granting of a more lenient sentence on account of the length of the proceedings is a general judicial practice in Hungary.	According to Article 349 of the Civil Code, the official liability of the State administration may be established only if the relevant ordinary remedies have been exhausted or have not been found adequate to redress the damage. Unless otherwise specified, this provision also covers the liability for damage caused by the courts or the prosecution authorities. Changes might be brought about by the amendments (applicable only to cases introduced after 1 July 2003) to the effect that compensation can be claimed irrespective of any fault on the part of the proceeding judge. According to S. 114 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a party may complain of the irregularity of proceedings at any time during the proceedings. Minutes shall be taken of any oral complaint to that effect. If the court fails to take such a complaint into account, the grounds for such failure shall be given immediately or, at the latest, in the final decision.

ICELAND
IRELAND	In the criminal context an accused can take Judicial Review proceedings seeking an order for prohibition against the prosecution on the ground of delay. This application is to be made before the High Court by an accused and must be made 'promptly'. The Court has an inherent jurisdiction to prohibit a prosecution where there is unreasonable delay. In the civil context defendants may seek an order for dismissal for want of prosecution in circumstances where there has been delay on the part of the Plaintiff. This application is made to the courts. Under the Courts and Court Officers Act 2002 section 46, if judgment has not been delivered within a prescribed period the Courts Service will list the matter before the relevant judge and at that time the Judge must fix a date by which time judgment will be delivered. According to a procedure initiated in 1996 any litigant who has a complaint in relation to delay must address it formally to the President of the High Court.	Under the European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003 an applicant may apply to the High Court for damages if an organ of State has not fulfilled its obligations under the Convention. Under that legislation the courts are excluded from the definition of organ of State but delay by the DPP or other State agents or agencies might give rise to this remedy.
ITALY	In 2001, the so-called "Pinto Law" introduced a specific domestic legal remedy with respect to the excessive length of proceedings allowing applicants to obtain a relief in the form of financial compensation before the Court of Appeal. A complaint can be lodged by anyone sustaining pecuniary or non-pecuniary damage as a result of a violation of ECHR. If a claim is grounded, a decision shall be communicated to State Council at the Court of Audit to enable him to start an investigation into liability, and to the authorities responsible for deciding whether to institute disciplinary proceedings against the civil servants involved.
LATVIA
LIECHTENSTEIN	A supervisory complaint in accordance with Art. 23 of the State Law on the Administration of Justice may be submitted by any party involved in proceedings and has to be filed with the	A violation of this basic right to prohibition of delay of justice may be asserted within the framework of the ordinary procedure for legal remedies. This violation of basic rights may also be

	Administrative Court if it concerns a refusal or a delay of justice on the part of the government; if it concerns other authorities, it has to be filed with the government (par. 1). Art. 23 of the Court Organisation Law governs the right of the parties involved in proceedings to file a supervisory complaint due to a delay or refusal of justice. If the supervisory complaint is made against the courts, the presidents of the courts or court officials, it has to be filed with the President of the Court of Appeal; if the complaint is made against the Court of Appeal or a member of that court, it has to be filed with the Supreme Court (par. 1). If court clerks or enforcement officers are the subject of the complaint, it has to be submitted to the President of the County Court (par. 3).	specifically invoked before the Constitutional Court by means of an individual complaint to protect rights guaranteed by the Constitution.
LITHUANIA	In the pending proceedings, the remedy in respect of excessive delays in the proceedings is the question of internal administration in the courts. In 2002, the Council of the Courts of the Republic of Lithuania adopted the Regulation on administration in the courts, according to which the chairmen of the courts are monitoring the administrative activities of the judges, which includes the measures to ensure the transparent and operative process of the investigation of the cases; checking of the cases of unjustifiably long judicial proceedings; the investigation of the complaints concerning the actions of the judges which are not related to the administration of justice etc. Therefore it is possible, that the chairman of the court, in responding to the justified complaint concerning the actions or omission of the judge, instructs the judge to speed up the judicial proceedings or initiates the disciplinary action against the judge.	National legal dispositions concerning the compensation of the damage, which was caused by the unlawful actions of the investigators, the procurator, the judge and the court. They are provided in the Civil Code of the Republic of Lithuania (Article 6.272) and the special Law on the Compensation of the Damage Made by Unlawful Actions of the State Authorities.
LUXEMBOURG		A State liability action under the Law on State responsibility.
MALTA		The issue of whether judicial proceedings are excessively long or not has to be raised by the party alleging it by means of a Court case. This can also be made in the form of constitutional complaint.

MOLDOVA	According to the provisions of Art.20 par. (4) and (5) of Criminal Procedure Code, the observance of the reasonable term during the criminal prosecution is secured by the prosecutor, and at the trial of the case by the respective court. The observance of the reasonable term during the trial of the certain cases will be verified by the hierarchically superior court in the proceeding of the trial of the respective case by ordinary and extraordinary remedy.	As for material compensations, art.204 par. (2) of Civil Procedure Code provides the commitment of the court, at the request of the interested party, to redress the prejudice caused by the delay, in the case another party provided ungrounded or false evidence in order to delay the trial. According to the art. 1422 of the Civil Code, the moral damage is provided in case the compliant proves that physical and psychical damages were caused by the facts that attempted to her/his personal non-patrimonial rights.
MONACO
NETHERLANDS	In criminal cases, and in administrative cases where a punitive sanction is at issue, recognition by the court that the reasonable-time requirement has been violated, may result in a mitigation of the penalty or of the punitive sanction.	There is the general remedy of a civil action against the State for tort.
NORWAY	In criminal cases where there have been excessive delays in the judicial proceedings, the courts shall acknowledge that such delays have taken place. In addition, the courts shall reduce the sentence.
POLAND	Act of 17 June 2004 on complaints about a breach of the right to a trial within a reasonable time established a specific remedy in respect of excessive delays in judicial (civil and criminal) as well as administrative (only before administrative courts) proceedings allowing speeding-up lengthy proceedings. The complaint can be lodged by everyone who has the pending case before domestic courts. The complaint shall be examined by the court immediately above the court conducting the impugned proceedings, this complaint shall be lodged while the proceedings are pending. If the superior court finds a violation of Art. 6 of the Convention, it instructs the lower court to take measures to accelerate the proceedings and/or awards the complainant compensation of up to 10,000 zł. (approximately 2,550 euros).	The party whose complaint as to the excessive length of the pending proceedings has been allowed, may in addition, in separate proceedings on the basis of Art. 417 of the Civil Code, request reparation of damage resulted from the established undue delay. Art. 417 of the Civil Code provided for a new regime of the State liability for damage caused by public authority. Party which has not lodged a complaint about the unreasonable length of the proceedings during judicial proceedings may claim – under Article 417 of the Civil Code – compensation for the damage which resulted from the unreasonable length of the proceedings after the proceedings concerning the merits of the case have ended.

PORTUGAL	the Criminal Procedure Code (of 1 January 1988) Article 108 “1. When the time-limits provided for by law for any step in the proceedings are exceeded, the public prosecutor, the accused, the private prosecutor (assistente) or the civil parties may make an application for an order to expedite the proceedings. 2. That application shall be considered by: (a) the Attorney-General, when the proceedings are in the hands of the Attorney-General’s Department; (b) the Judicial Service Commission, when the proceedings are taking place in a court or before a judge. 3. No judge who has intervened in the proceedings in any capacity may participate in the decision.” Article 109 “ /.../ 3. The Attorney-General shall make a decision within five days. /.../ 5. The decision shall be taken without any other formalities. It may take the form of: (a) a dismissal of the application as unfounded or because the delays complained of are justified; (b) a request for further information...; (c) an order for an investigation to be carried out within fifteen days into the delays complained of...; (d) a proposal to implement or cease to implement disciplinary measures or measures to manage, organise or rationalise the methods required by the situation.	Article 22 of the Constitution : “The State and other public bodies shall be jointly and severally liable in civil law with the members of their agencies, their officials or their agents for actions or omissions in the performance of their duties, or caused by such performance, which result in violations of rights, freedoms or safeguards or in prejudice to another party.” Furthermore, Legislative Decree no. 48051 governs the State’s non-contractual civil liability. Pursuant to its Article 2 § 1, “The State and other public bodies shall be liable to third parties in civil law for such breaches of their rights or of legal provisions designed to protect the interests of such parties as are caused by unlawful acts committed with negligence (culpa) by their agencies or officials in the performance of their duties or as a consequence thereof.”
ROMANIA
RUSSIAN FEDERATION	Criminal proceedings The institute of remitting the criminal case for further investigation was excluded from the Criminal Procedure Code of the Russian Federation. Article 237 of the Code, however, allows remitting of the criminal case to public prosecutor for removal of formal deficiencies in the case file that pose obstacle for its consideration by court. The possibility to appeal the decision on remitting the case to public prosecutor was upheld by the	Article 1070.1 of the Civil Code of the Russian Federation provides for compensation by the state of damage caused in the process of administration of justice in case when the guilt of a judge has been established by the court sentence that became final. Disciplinary sanctions against judges

	Constitutional Court of the Russian Federation in its Decision of 20 October 2005 No 404-O on complaint by L.G.Verzhutskaya. The Constitutional Court of the Russian Federation in its Judgment of 2 July 1998 and Judgment of 23 March 1999 No 5-P also upheld the possibility to lodge appeals to a higher court against decisions to suspend criminal proceedings (both at trial and pre-trial stages) and decisions to delay hearing that could result in delays of proceedings. A decision to extend the period of investigation may also be appealed to a court. This directly follows from Article 46 of the Constitution, and was confirmed by the Constitutional Court in its Judgment of 23 March 1999 No 5-P. The court may revoke any unfounded or unlawful extension.	Articles 12.1 and 14 of the Law "On the status of judges in the Russian Federation" set forth that a judge can be subjected to disciplinary sanction in forms of a warning or termination of powers for disciplinary offences. Competent Judicial Qualifications Board shall pass the relevant decision. There is no legislative definition of the notion of "disciplinary offence"; in practice, however, it has been given rather wide interpretation, and can include, inter alia, a judge's action (or failure to act) resulting in violation of reasonable time requirement in respect to the length of proceedings or other violations of procedure. Apart from this, procedural actions of a judge shall be subject to appeal in a procedure provided for by the civil procedure legislation of the Russian Federation (Chapters 40 and 41 of the Civil Procedure Code of the Russian Federation)".
SAN MARINO		As Article 6 § 1 ECHR may be considered as a self-executing provision, it may be considered that an ordinary action for damages may be brought before the civil judge on the ground of breach of the reasonable time requirement.
SERBIA AND MONTENEGRO	A central monitoring body has been established by the recent amendments to the Law on Judges. This Oversight Board is comprised of five justices of the Supreme Court, and has the authority to inspect any case, pending or concluded before any court, and can institute disciplinary proceedings against a judge who has not performed his or her duties in a conscientious and competent manner, and can recommend the judge to be dismissed from office. Any party can file a complaint to the Oversight Board, or to the president of the court which is deciding on the particular case. The Board does not have the power to award damages. The complaint to the Oversight Board is specifically designed to be used for	On the basis of the combined provisions of the Law on Contracts and Torts, and the special provisions of the Law on the Courts and the Law on Judges, any party to an unreasonably long judicial proceeding can sue the State in a civil action for material and moral damages caused by the improper actions of a state organ, in this case a court.

SLOVAKIA	speeding up pending cases. According to the Section 250t of the Code of Civil Procedure, a person or legal entity may lodge a complaint before the court against inactivity of a public administration authority. When the complaint is considered justified, the court has the power to impose a time-limit within which the public administrative authority is obliged to take a decision. Law No. 514/2003 on State liability for damage caused in the exercise of public authority (in force since 1 July 2004) in its Article 9 provides that the State is liable for damage caused by an incorrect act, including non-compliance with the obligation to perform an act or give a decision within the statutory time-limit. A person can lodge a complaint against undue delays in judicial proceedings to the President of an ordinary court including the Supreme court according to Articles 62 to 70 of the Law No. 757/2004 Collection of Laws on courts. The result of an investigation in such a case can lead to the conclusion on undue delay in particular proceedings and subsequently to the instigation of disciplinary proceedings against a judge under Article 116 of the Law No. 385/2000 Collection of Laws on judges and lay judges.	In accordance with Article 4c of the Complaints Act of 1998, a person can lodge a complaint alleging, inter alia, the violation of their rights or legally protected interests as a result of an action of a public authority or its failure to act. The complaint will be examined by the head of the public authority concerned or by the hierarchically superior authority if directed against the head of the public authority itself. Article 127 of the Constitution (as amended in 2001) provides: “1. The Constitutional Court shall decide on complaints lodged by natural or legal persons alleging a violation of their fundamental rights or freedoms or of human rights and fundamental freedoms enshrined in international treaties ratified by the Slovak Republic ... unless the protection of such rights and freedoms falls within the jurisdiction of a different court. 2. When the Constitutional Court finds that a complaint is justified, it shall deliver a decision stating that a person's rights or freedoms set out in paragraph 1 were violated as a result of a final decision, by a particular measure or by means of other interference. It shall quash such a decision, measure or other interference. When the violation found is the result of a failure to act, the Constitutional Court may order [the authority] which violated the rights or freedoms in question to take the necessary action. At the same time the Constitutional Court may return the case to the authority concerned for further proceedings, order the authority concerned to abstain from violating fundamental rights and freedoms ... or, where appropriate, order those who violated the rights or freedoms set out in paragraph 1 to restore the situation existing prior to the violation.
----------	--	--

		3. In its decision on a complaint the Constitutional Court may grant adequate financial satisfaction to the person whose rights under paragraph 1 were violated”...
SLOVENIA	A person alleging the violation of this right can lodge a complaint with the Administrative Court against lengthy proceedings in pending cases. Under Article 62 of the Administrative Dispute Act, the injured party may request, besides the abolishment of the infringement of his or her constitutional right, also the compensation for damage inflicted. Article 3 of the “Act on the Protection of the Rights to a Trial without Undue Delay” provides for the following remedies to protect the right to a trial without undue delay: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Supervisory appeal - appeal with a motion to expedite the hearing of the case, which is filed with the court hearing the case. 2. Motion for a deadline, which is filed with the court hearing the case, the president of which has to refer it together with the case file to the president of the superior court. 3. Claim for just satisfaction – if the supervisory appeal was granted or if the motion for a deadline was filed, the party may claim just satisfaction which may be provided by: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Payment of monetary compensation, which shall be payable for non-pecuniary damage in the amount of 300 up to 5 000 euros; • A written statement of the State Attorney’s Office that the party’s right to a trial without undue delay was violated; • The publication of a judgment that the party’s right to a trial without undue delay was violated; 	The party can lodge a constitutional appeal with the Constitutional Court under Section 51 § 1 of the Constitutional Court Act. Action for pecuniary damage caused by a violation of the right to a trial without undue delay may be brought in accordance with the Obligations Code.
SPAIN		An amparo appeal can be filed (while proceedings are still pending) on the basis of Articles 24 and 53 § 2 of the

		Constitution. The Constitutional Court Act provides in Section 44(1)(c) “1. An amparo appeal in respect of a violation of rights and guarantees capable of constitutional protection ... does not lie unless ... the violation in question has been formally alleged in the proceedings in question as soon as possible after it has occurred...” Article 121 of the Constitution provides that: “Losses incurred as a result of judicial errors or a malfunctioning of the administration of justice shall be compensated by the State. According to Section 292 of the Judicature Act: “1. Anyone who incurs a loss as a result of a judicial error or a malfunctioning of the judicial system shall be compensated by the State, other than in cases of force majeure, in accordance with the provisions of this Part. Section 293(2) “In the event of a judicial error or a malfunctioning of the judicial system, the complainant shall submit his claim for compensation to the Ministry of Justice. The claim shall be examined in accordance with the provisions governing the State’s financial liability. An appeal shall lie to the administrative courts against the decision of the Ministry of Justice. The right to compensation shall lapse one year after it could first have been exercised.”
SWEDEN	In criminal proceedings, an unreasonable length may cause the sentence imposed to be more lenient. Thus, chapter 29 section 5 and chapter 30 section 4 of the Penal Code provide that courts in criminal cases shall, both in its choice of sanction and in its determination of the appropriate punishment, take into account whether an unnaturally long time has elapsed since the commission of the offence.	Pursuant to chapter 3 section 2 of the 1972 Tort Liability Act the State shall be held liable to pay compensation for personal injury, loss of or damage to property and financial loss where such loss, injury or damage has been caused by a wrongful act or omission done in the course of, or in connection with, the exercise of public authority in carrying out functions for the performance of which the State

		is responsible.. A public official who intentionally or through carelessness disregards the duties of his office, e.g. by omitting to render a decision in a matter that is pending before him, may be held criminally or administratively responsible and subjected to criminal or disciplinary sanctions (chapter 20 section 1 of the Penal Code and section 14 of the Public Employment Act).
SWITZERLAND	At canton level most codes of criminal procedure explicitly provide for the competent authorities to conduct proceedings within a reasonable time. The violation of this principle may give rise to: "due consideration in the fixing of the sentence; release of the defendant, when the time-limit for legal action has run out; exemption from punishment if the defendant is found guilty; termination of the proceedings (as an ultima ratio in extreme cases)."	According to the Federal Law on the Liability of the Confederation, Members of its Authorities and Officials (14 march 1958), the Confederation is responsible for the damage caused by an official in the course of the exercise of his/her functions.
"THE FORMER YUGOSLAV REPUBLIC OF MACEDONIA"	There is an administrative remedy within the competences of the Ministry of Justice in the area of judicial administration. According to Article 77 of the Law on the Courts, the Ministry of Justice is competent to review the complaints of the citizens concerning the work of the courts especially those related to delays in the court proceedings. The complaint is lodged in writing, by the party in the proceeding. Upon the complaint the Ministry of Justice in written correspondence with the court obtains information regarding the case (especially about the reasons for the delay and to whom is the delay attributable) and informs the complainant about its findings again in writing. The Ministry of Justice cannot order the court to undertake certain measures for speeding-up the procedure in a particular case. If the Ministry of Justice finds that the delay in the procedure is a result of unprofessional and unethical conduct of the judge sitting in the case, the Ministry can inform the Judicial Council of the Republic of Macedonia and propose dismissal of the judge.
TURKEY
UKRAINE	In accordance with Articles 6 and 31 of the Law on Status of Judges, a disciplinary proceeding can be instituted against the judge who has not performed his or her duties in compliance with the Constitution and legislation concerning	Article 55 § 1 of the Constitution of Ukraine guarantees to everyone "the right to challenge before a court decisions, actions or omissions of State authorities, local self-

	observation of time-limits while administering justice. A judge can also be held responsible for deliberate violation of the legislation in force or omission that caused substantive consequences.	government bodies, officials and officers”. “A citizen has a right of access to a court if he or she considers that his or her rights have been violated by actions or omissions of a State authority, a legal entity or officials acting in an official capacity. Among entities whose actions or omissions may be challenged before the competent court listed in the first paragraph of this provision are the bodies of State executive power and their officials”.
UNITED KINGDOM	There is no specific remedy for excessive delay applicable in all proceedings in English and Scots law. However, one aim that motivated recent reforms in civil procedure in England and Wales is the importance of ensuring that cases are dealt with expeditiously and fairly. Civil judges now exercise an important case-management role that seeks to minimise delay and to ensure that the court's handling of a case is proportionate to the value and difficulty of what is in dispute. In exercise of their inherent jurisdiction, the criminal courts may stay a prosecution where there has been an unreasonable lapse of time such that a fair trial could not be held. Moreover, both in English and Scots law, criminal proceedings are subject to legislative time-limits, particularly as to the length of time in which an accused person may be held in detention pending trial; in some circumstances, when these limits have been exceeded, the accused person must be set free without trial. Under the Human Rights Act 1998 (see adjoining column) the position in Scotland is that an accused person must be discharged where trial has not taken place within a reasonable time; in English law, the accused must be discharged only where any unreasonable delay that has occurred has prejudiced the fairness of any trial that were now held.	Under the HRA, all courts and tribunals must where possible give effect to Article 6(1) ECHR and take account of the jurisprudence of the ECtHR. If a court or tribunal fails to give effect to the ECHR when it could have done so, this will be a ground of appeal to a higher court or tribunal.