OF ELECTION OBSERVERS

and the Venice Commission at its 79th plenary session
(Venice, 12-13 June 2009)

Introduction

1. Following the Report on an internationally recognised status of election observers¹ adopted by the Venice Commission at the request of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, the need for recommendations leading to an internationally recognised status of election observers became apparent.

2. Parliamentary Assembly election observation reports as well as similar reports from OSCE/ODIHR were closely examined to achieve this and in order to obtain a global vision of election observation within Council of Europe member states, and an overview of domestic legislation dealing with provisions on election observation..²

3. Before going into substance, a distinction should be made between assessment and observation made by the election observers. By observing, the election observers collect information on given elements of the electoral process on the spot. By assessing the electoral process, the election observers evaluate information received from other stakeholders and which requires more caution; such assessment will be made generally in the final exhaustive election observation mission reports.

4. This document was prepared on the basis of international election observation mission reports which highlight possible improvements in national electoral legislation. It aims at summarising the main elements emphasised in these reports.

5. This document was adopted by the Council for Democratic Elections at its 29th meeting (Venice, 11 June 2009) and by the Venice Commission at its 79th plenary session (Venice, 12-13 June 2009).

Possible improvements in national electoral legislation on the basis of international election observation missions' reports

6. Various countries, mostly Central and Eastern European countries amended their domestic electoral legislation in order to bring them in line with the 1990 OSCE Copenhagen Document and with other international standards. On the contrary, most Western European countries did not implement such international standards in their legislation, probably due to the absence of international monitoring and to confidence in the electoral process. Moreover, in the latter case, electoral processes are guaranteed by the presence of candidates or parties' proxies.³

7. In this regard, it is important to legally recognise proxies' rights at the same level as non-partisan observers' rights.⁴ Additionally, it should be noted that party proxies act under the responsibility of their political party and accreditation may be delivered by the party.⁵ Proxies and observers should however not be so numerous that they render proper observation difficult.

8. Various election observation missions' reports underline transparency and public credibility in the electoral process strengthened by the active involvement of the civil society.⁶ It has been underlined in this regard that a distinction between domestic and international observers should be avoided in order not to limit the rights of domestic observers compared to international ones.⁷

9. Concerning international election observation missions, it is important that the legislation provides provisions on the competent authorities able to invite international organisations to observe the various kinds of elections as well as referenda.⁸

10. Election observation missions' reports advise national authorities on improving the fulfilment of rights for domestic and international election observers' rights in their domestic electoral legislations. The observation process has therefore to be helped by local authorities. For proper and efficient observation as well, polling stations and counting centres have to be accessible to the observers and well organised (e.g.: shortening the distance between observers and counting tables for better observation).⁹ Election commission meetings should be widely accessible to all kinds of observers, including tabulation of results process.¹⁰ Freedom of movement for observers should be guaranteed for a wide observation process during all stages of the electoral process.¹¹

11. Remedies should be ensured to observers before national or local authorities in case their rights are denied in the course of the observation process.¹² Competent authorities should quickly solve such complaints since the electoral process is short.¹³

12. Most of national electoral legislation provides provisions regarding the accreditation process that may concern individual observers, NGOs and international institutions. Such a process should be simple,¹⁴ and its attribution criteria as well as deadlines be clearly defined in legislation.¹⁵

13. Attribution criteria for observation accreditation should not be restrictive.¹⁶ The accreditation process should be simple and harmonised throughout the country if there is a decentralised process of accreditation (for instance for the regional NGOs observing the elections); notably a single registration should be sufficient for the whole country. Concerning international observation missions, countries cannot refuse the presence of any particular nationality in a delegation representing organisations or institutions invited to observe.¹⁷ In a few cases, the country stipulated as a condition that observers have prior experience in election observation.¹⁸ Even if such an argument may be of interest, the hosting country should not impose such criteria, the competence belonging to the international institutions invited or to the country of the considered nationals.

14. Moreover, it is advisable to extend accreditation to the entire territory of the hosting country, and not to limit accreditation to specific electoral districts or precincts.¹⁹

15. In order to avoid timeframe problems in ensuring accreditations, the accreditation process should be quick once a request is received.²⁰ In the case of prior refusal of accreditation with finally a successful appeal from the observation group, the hosting country should also issue accreditation quickly, permitting accreditation in time.²¹

16. It is assumed that domestic electoral authorities adopt a flexible attitude regarding accreditation and related deadlines to requesting organisations, especially concerning domestic organisations.²² Too severe an approach could be interpreted as a hostile attitude towards the observation process.

17. Moreover, refusal to grant accreditation should be open to appeal by the requesting domestic group or institution. Grounds for denying accreditation should be communicated in written form and in a timely manner.

18. Accreditation for NGOs or NGO groups is also bound by the legislation dealing with associations. For instance, it can be requested that election observation be declared in the association by-law.²³

19. Some attribution criteria proper to NGOs do exist. For example, independence vis-à-vis the political parties has to be guaranteed by an NGO, for itself,²⁴ for all its observers²⁵ and for its bona fides as well.²⁶

20. The nationality of an NGO can also be a selection criterion by the accrediting authority. For such a reason, foreign NGOs see their accreditation rejected,²⁷ while there are more and more of them applying for observation missions in foreign countries.²⁸

21. Such criteria can appear too severe or could limit the value of an observation process. On the contrary, it occurred that a NGO was asked to have a national dimension in its observation process, which is almost impossible in some large countries.²⁹

22. However, the lack of domestic observers is not necessarily proof that national authorities have impeded the election observation process; on the contrary, population and civil society can show wide confidence towards the electoral process.³⁰

23. It often happens that recommendations made following election observation do not have any effect.³¹ In such cases, European countries should show a positive example and, if necessary, reform their electoral legislation in order to include provisions on the observation process.³²

24. Finally, it is crucial that electoral authorities as well as domestic and international observers be well informed of their rights and duties in the election observation process to ensure a smooth observation process and in order to give citizens confidence in the electoral process.³³

Conclusions

25. This report on the current situation regarding the status of election observers, drawn up on the basis of reports from the international election observation missions of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and OSCE/ODIHR, underlines the diversity of provisions regulating this status, including the lack of such a status or the lack of sufficient safeguards in this regard in national electoral legislation. In particular, some national electoral pieces of legislation make a distinction – difficult to justify – between national and international observers where others do not. Improvements are feasible and recommended in most national electoral texts of the considered member States, regardless of their level of democratic development. On the basis of this report, the Venice Commission will develop Guidelines on an internationally recognised status of election observers.
